PREFACE.

THE UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, which is now offered in a complete form to the public, is a work which, when the labor and care involved in its preparation are considered, has been equalled by few works in the history of literature. Nearly seventeen years of labor were consumed by the experienced editor and his corps of able assistants in its preparation. Nor is this period in any sense extreme when we consider the character of the work, original alike in its conception and its handling, and occupying as it does new ground in the republic of letters. The labor involved in the preparation of an ordinary dictionary—such a one, for instance, as Webster or Worcester—is exceedingly great, but this labor is increased to an extent which few persons appreciate in the case of a work like the present, which is not alone a dictionary, but adds to it the characteristics of an encyclopædia; giving not only the meanings of words, but their entire history, and a compact array of the most valuable information concerning them.

The UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, was originally intended to be limited to 4656 pages; but it became evident to the editor as the work progressed, that if it was to be completed in the exhaustive manner in which it had been commenced a considerable addition to this space would be necessary, and in the end nearly 700 pages were added, bringing the full work up to the grand total of 5359 pages—a library in a book. This addition was necessary to the completion of the work without unjust condensation of its concluding portions. Many who have occasion to refer to existing dictionaries must have noticed how the last few letters, say from S to Z, have been compressed in order to bring the whole work within the limits originally laid out for it. Such a treatment causes a serious detriment to the value of any book so handled, and the publishers, in the present instance, decided that the fullest justice should be given to every word, however it might lengthen the total work. As a consequence, the public have now given them in the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, the most exhaustive dictionary of the English language ever offered to the reading world. It was designed and has been carried out on a plan adopted by no other dictionary, the intention being to give the history of each word, step by step, showing the successive gradations of its meanings, as they rose out of each other, and illustrating each meaning by quotations from the written or printed page. In addition to this completeness of dictionary treatment, each word has been handled in the encyclopædic sense, and a vast amount of compact information in art, science, history and other branches of knowledge given, the whole rendering the work of inestimable value alike to reader and student. In this conception, involving as it did years of labor and research, the editor has eminently succeeded, and the publishers have no hesitation in offering the result of his labor to the public as one without a rival in plan and unsurpassed in execution.

The UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, contains in round numbers some 180,000 words or headings (250,000, including compound words). If this be compared with the number contained in other dictionaries, it will be seen at once how exhaustive it is. The early edition of Webster's Dictionary contained 70,000 words. Worcester's Dictionary and Supplement contains 116,000 words, Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, 118,000 words, and Webster's International Dictionary, 140,000 words. The UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, thus contains 40,000 more words than this most elaborate of its rivals.

But this is far from indicating the full measure of its comparative value, which cannot be estimated by the extra number of words alone. The completeness of treatment of each word must also be taken into account. Each has here been subdivided as far as possible into the various meanings which it assumed at different times, so that its treatment is not simply orthographical, but distinctively historical. The sorting and arranging of the slips containing quotations illustrative of the various senses in which words occur has been a task requiring very great care and labor, and one which has cost the editor and his assistants many hours of anxious thought.* The exhaustive character of the present work, therefore, cannot be fairly judged from its number of words as compared with other dictionaries, since the space given to many words greatly exceeds that given by other lexicographers. A truer conception can be gained by comparing the total space occupied. Thus Webster's International Dictionary contains (exclusive of Introduction, Appendix, etc.) 1681 pages, and Worcester's Dictionary 1696 pages, while the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, with similar exclusions, extends to 5249 pages, or more than three times the number in either of the two leading dictionaries named.

It may be said further that the work has been brought up to date, words which have only recently come into use being duly inserted in their places, so that one may find within its pages a complete history of the English language from the time that this language fairly began to exist to the final decade of the Nineteenth Century.

The name of the editor, indeed, is a sufficient guarantee for the character of the work, Dr. Hunter's superior ability for a task of this kind being beyond question. His duties—which were a labor of love—were lightened by the valuable assistance of Mr. John Williams, M.A., of Trinity College, Oxford, and Mr. S. J. Herrtage, B.A., these two gentlemen having mainly prepared the dictionary portion of the work, while Dr. Hunter contributed the large majority of the encyclopædic articles. In adapting the work to the American public useful assistance has been rendered by Prof. Charles Morris, well known for his large experience in encyclopædia work; by Prof. A. Estoclet, who, as a word-definer, occupies a high rank among American lexicographers; and by Prof. Seneca Egbert, M.D., of the Medico-Chirurgical College, Philadelphia. These general editorial labors were supplemented by material furnished by numerous specialists in various branches of science and art. The names of, and the classes of material furnished by, some few of these writers have been given on the title page; but it is impossible to mention by name a tithe of those who have contributed directly or indirectly to the work. Presidents, secretaries and members of scientific and learned societies, the chief officers of religious bodies, university professors, government officials, and a host of private persons have rendered willing aid by affording information in many cases possessed by themselves alone, the accuracy of the work being thus assured and its completion greatly hastened. The gratitude of the publishers and the thanks of the public are due to these voluntary co-laborers, who have done so much towards making the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, what it is acknowledged to be, an invaluable work of reference for all classes of readers.

* It is a curious fact that, as a general rule, the shorter the word, the more numerous its subdivisions and the more difficult its treatment. See, as examples, such words as: be, do, go, bring, take, etc.

THE FUNCTIONS OF A DICTIONARY.

The rapid growth and spread of living languages, the progress of philological and linguistic science, and the facilities afforded by the art of printing for the diffusion of knowledge, have made the dictionary an essential requisite to modern literature. The dictionary, as we now understand the term, is of comparatively recent origin. Manuscript vocabularies existed in ancient times, but the revival of classical learning at the close of the mediæval period created a necessity for the compilation of lexicons of the Greek and Latin tongues, and these were quickly followed by dictionaries of the modern languages, brief at first, but growing in amplitude as time went on and the demands of readers increased. This growth of the dictionary continues; modern languages are in a constant state of change and development; new words are continually being introduced in response to the demands of civilized progress, and older words are frequently dropping out of use: thus it is that the labors of the lexicographer are still, and probably will long continue to be, in demand. A dictionary may be described as an enlarged index verborum, a key to the works of the great masters who have adorned, and the speech of the people who have used, the language of whose elements it professes to be a repository. To serve, in any complete manner, the purposes for which it is designed, it must conform to certain requisites.

1. It should contain every word which properly belongs to the language and occurs in its printed literature, from the period when it became a distinct form of speech to the latest date.

2. It should give these words in the various forms of orthography which they have successively assumed, indicating those which are obsolete and those which are still in use.

3. It should represent by some simple and comprehensible system the pronunciation of every word, and the changes which have taken place in pronunciation, so far as known.

4. It should give as complete definitions as possible of the original and historically developed meanings, literal and topical, of each word, with copious exemplifications of their uses, in every sense ascribed to them, since the force and significance of words cannot be fully conveyed by definitions alone.

5. It should contain such combinations of words, popularly called phrases or idioms, as have acquired a special signification not indicated by the ordinary meanings of the words composing them. It should treat as compounds all word combinations whose sense cannot be inferred from the meanings of their component elements, and should, where practicable, give in full the original formula of which they are often elliptical expressions.

6. The etymological history of each word, not formed by the regular modes of derivation and composition from other or naturalized words, should be traced from its earliest known or probable native root, or foreign analogue, to its latest form, and reference should be made to all related words which either explain any of its forms or meanings, or serve to show the ethnological relations of the language to other tongues.

Such is the ideal of a perfect dictionary. It is one that has rarely been attained or even closely approached. Up to the last few years lexicographers, or rather the compilers of dictionaries, have been content to copy from their predecessors, adding what fresh material they could readily obtain, but usually not taking the trouble to verify the words, definitions, or quotations found in existing works of the same kind. Misreadings and misspellings have thus been perpetuated, and in some cases words and meanings been given which had no existence beyond the brain of the compiler. Fortunately, in recent times, lexicographers have become far more careful and exacting, and the dictionaries of the present day are becoming, in a truer sense than ever before, faithful and trustworthy histories of the words of the various languages.

No other extant dictionary, however, can claim to fill the requisites above given in so full a sense as the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, in whose preparation all these essentials have been sedulously attended to, with the purpose of making it, aside from its encyclopædic character, a complete and perfect dictionary of the English language.

SPECIAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY.

I. WHAT IT CONTAINS.

In many respects the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, differs from its predecessors, and as well from its immediate rivals. In the first place, as the title implies, it is not an ordinary dictionary, in the sense of being confined to a mere alphabetical list of the words composing our language, but it partakes also of the character of an encyclopædia. In fact, it is at once a dictionary and an encyclopædia; it explains not only words but things; it gives not only the meanings of words, but also an explanation of the things to which such words are applied. For instance, under the words Gas, Steam Engine, Spectroscope, Architecture, etc., it does not confine itself to a bare account of the words, but gives a concise account of the things understood by these terms. Further, where such seemed likely to be of service to the student, an historical account of events connected with the word treated of has been given, supplemented by statistics brought up to the latest date. We may instance such words as Appendicitis, Roentgen Rays, Electrocution, Germ Theory, etc. With the exception of the terms of geography and biography, the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, contains all the words to be found in an extended cyclopædia, while the dictionary proper includes not only modern English words, but a nearly exhaustive list of obsolete words from about Chaucer's time to the present, and, in addition, a complete vocabulary of words to be found in the works of Scott and Burns, the most widely read authors in Scottish literature.

1. TECHNICAL TERMS.

In the compilation of a dictionary, one of the most important questions which arises is: What words can legitimately claim admission? This question is, of course, answered differently in different cases, in accordance with the scope of the plan and the degree of fulness with which it is proposed to treat the language. The present work being much more than an ordinary dictionary, or mere list of words with definitions, it necessarily contains very many words not usually included in dictionaries. Among these there can be no question that technical terms are entitled to insertion. The very title of the work expressly includes all such terms.

Not only science and art, but sports and every day occupations need to be attended to. While, for instance, racing, coursing, tennis, golf, and other games and sports, have terms of their own which are becoming more and more widely known, a definition of most of these terms would be vainly looked for in existing dictionaries, and could be found only in vocabularies specially devoted to such subjects. Even where admitted they are often incorrectly defined. In the present work an attempt has been made to include a complete collection of these technical terms, and to define them fully and accurately, thus giving the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY a special value to the large number of persons interested in the popular amusements, as well as those devoted to the arts and sciences. The same may be said in regard to legal terms, the technical words and phrases of the various law processes being clearly described, and all changes made of late years duly noted.

2. SLANG AND COLLOQUIALISMS.

The propriety of inserting slang and colloquial terms and phrases may by some be questioned, yet certainly many of these may fairly claim a place. Few will question this so far as colloquialisms, as distinguished from slang proper, are concerned. It is difficult for many English-speaking people, and impossible for foreigners, to guess at the meaning of numbers of our colloquial phrases from a reference to the literal meaning of the words composing them. This has induced the editor of the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY to give special attention to such phrases, and there will be found in this work, arranged under the heading of the main word, as complete a collection of colloquialisms as it was found possible to bring together. The right of slang terms and phrases to insertion is more open to question, but cogent reasons for giving them a place may be urged. In the first place, slang, or semi-slang, words and phrases enter largely into the language of commercial and social life, and it is often difficult to distinguish between what is slang and what is colloquial. Secondly, slang frequently expresses meanings and shades of meaning which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to convey exactly and clearly in more classical language. Thirdly, what is slang to-day, may to-morrow be recognized and used as good English by even our best writers.

On the other hand, many words now tabooed as slang, or even worse, were formerly used in good society; examples of which may be seen by reading "Pepys' Diary." Slang is also largely employed by the realistic novelists of the present day, so that it is mere prudery to affect ignorance of its existence, and it certainly should not be ignored in a dictionary of the present kind, to which it is hoped that every one will naturally turn who is at a loss to appreciate exactly the meaning of a word or phrase. It is not, of course, intended, nor would it be desirable, to insert every slang word. But in the modern growth of language slang terms are, in a measure, the roots of new words, and all that seem likely to attain this future dignity are fairly entitled to a present place. And many which will doubtless die out, or be replaced by others, are now so widely used or understood as to give them a similar claim.

3. SPECIAL COINAGES.

Each case belonging to this class must be judged on its own merits, and no strict line or rule can be laid down. Many of these words are amusing and interesting, while some are eminently expressive, and until the whole body of English literature has been carefully read it would be rash to assert positively that any such word is peculiar to the author in whose works the first instance (so far as known) of its use occurs. For instance, Madame D'Arbly, in her "Diary," uses the word agreeability, and claims it as her own coinage; yet Chaucer uses the same word. Disraeli, in his "Curiosities of Literature," claims to have coined the word fatherland. Yet it was used by Sir William Temple a century and more before him. Both these words are now given in ordinary dictionaries, and many such special coinages are as legitimate as other words, of no greater utility which have found a place in lexicons. There are others which may be looked upon as mere curiosities of literature,—such, for instance, as compactability and writability. Words of this kind can only be inserted as oddities, freaks of writers' fancies, and such of them as have been given is with this view alone, the purpose being to raise the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, to a standard of completeness as a mirror of the English language and literature which none of its competitors even seek to attain.

4. SEMI-NATURALIZED WORDS.

There can hardly be any question as to the necessity of admitting this class of words into any dictionary that claims to be at all a complete vocabulary of the English language as ordinarily spoken and written. Many words now fully recognized as components of the language were only a few years ago looked upon as foreign. Thus a critic of the date of 1799 speaks of an author as having "disfigured his pages with the French words fracas, route and trait," while Gray names together as French words advertisement, éclat, ennui, fracas, haûtgout, raillery, and ridicule. Of the many words belonging to this class may be named collaborateur, millionaire, reverie, antique, cocoa, hammock, hurricane, potato and mufti, nearly all of which have become good English words.

5. HYBRID COMPOUNDS.

Hybrid compounds, i. e., words made up from two different languages, have, as a rule, been inserted, though, in many instances, not without hesitation, as in the case of diamondiferous. But English abounds in such words, in which occasionally, as in the case of interloper, which is half Latin and half Dutch, the two languages from which the word is made up are brought into strange conjunction. Similar instances are cablegram, daguerreotype, nonsense, somnambulist, peajacket, and many words beginning with the prefixes dis-, inter-, mis- and over-. In all cases of hybrid compounds each word has had to be judged on its own merits.

II. ARRANGEMENT AND STYLE.

The style in which the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY has been compiled differs in many particulars from that of all its predecessors. An important lesson has been learned from a study of their deficiencies, and a strong effort made to add to the value of the present work in every detail. These special excellences of treatment may be concisely pointed out.

1. The adoption of various styles of type removes all difficulty in distinguishing the several divisions and subdivisions of the words. In these divisions it will be noted that a regular system, entirely original, has been adopted. Verbs, for instance, are first divided into transitive and intransitive. This division, while it may interfere with the historical order of the various meanings, has been adopted from its convenience for reference by the general reader. The transitive and intransitive divisions are next subdivided as follows: firstly, into meanings used in ordinary language; and, secondly, into technical uses. A further subdivision of each of these is then made into literal and figurative senses. Last of all come the phrases and idioms connected with each verb. So far as the above divisions and subdivisions apply, the same course has been adopted in the case of nouns, adjectives and adverbs. Each word has been broken up into as many different meanings as can be discovered or are illustrated by quotations. Words of the same form, but from different roots, and therefore really different words, are placed under separate headings. The placing of such words under a single heading, as is often done in other dictionaries, gives readers a confused idea of their etymology, and may often lead them into serious errors.

2. The etymologies given in the present work are based on the best and latest authorities. The cognate forms of each word in other languages are shown distinct from the roots. This is an important feature, since in some of the leading dictionaries the roots and the cognate words or forms are mixed up in a way calculated to mislead and bewilder the reader, if unfamiliar with etymology, and often to make him conclude that the English word has been derived from the whole of the others.

3. The technology is almost as full as in works of special technical reference; so full, indeed, as almost to supersede the necessity for the use of dictionaries of technical terms, and to give to this work a manifold utility.

4. Quotations illustrative of every sense of every word are employed freely, and with as full references as it was possible to give. In this respect the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY far surpasses all its predecessors, inasmuch as in them, with very few exceptions, only the name of an author is given, reference being rarely made to the name of the work quoted from, and still more rarely to the chapter, page or line of the book. Many quotations, it will be seen, are taken from newspapers and periodicals. But where can be found so many instances of words in every day use, well understood, and recognized in every way as elements of the English language, as in the columns of the press? It is hardly possible for an observant reader to take up any of the leading daily papers without coming across some word or phrase either wholly omitted from, or imperfectly explained in, our existing dictionaries. Colloquial words and phrases abound in them, and it will be noted that from them have been quoted, in the present work, a large number of technical terms connected with sporting, examples of which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find elsewhere. The writers in our leading daily papers and periodicals are, in many, if not in most, cases far superior in their knowledge and use of the English language to the authors of many of the books published in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and are more entitled to be quoted as authorities for particular uses and meanings of words surviving in the same senses.

5. Illustrations are freely given where it has been considered that they would assist the reader to understand the word treated of. These, though finely made and artistic in character, are in no sense mere embellishments, but in every case help to elucidate the text.

6. The pronunciation of the words is shown by diacritical marks, the key to which is, for the sake of convenience, printed at the foot of each page. Special attention has been given to this highly important subject, the precise value of each vowel being indicated with a clearness and exactness that stand unrivalled among ordinary dictionaries. The common method is to mark only the vowels of the accented syllables. In the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, every vowel has its sound indicated. "Every vowel sound must have some quality," we are told; "and no pronouncing dictionary can lay any just claim to completeness if it fails to tell what that sound is." This essential requisite has been most carefully attended to in the present work. Of the innumerable instances that might be adduced we shall give but one. The word anatomy, for instance, is ordinarily marked as follows: A-năt'-o-my. In the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, it is marked An-ăt'-ôm-ÿ, each vowel being given its special sound, in accordance with the very full series of diacritical marks placed at the foot of the page.

In this work the current pronunciation has been adopted as the standard. "While speaking of pronunciation," says Dr. Murray, "I may refer to the great variety of pronunciation in many words and classes of words at present to be found; and also to the fact that the dictionary pronunciation of many words, as founded on the labors of Walker, Sheridan, Nares, Smart, Worcester, and other orthoepists, and found in most existing dictionaries and spelling books, is often obsolete in actual usage, and in the case of words specially irregular, replaced by one which is evidently founded upon the spelling." Some writers tell us that "there is no standard of pronunciation." There is, in truth, only one, that of "popular usage and usage of English scholarship." This highest standard, the pronunciations in vogue among the cultivated people of the present day, is the one employed in the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY. It should be remembered that no orthoepist has the right to make pronunciations; his utmost privilege is to follow popular usage.

By lack of attention to this requisite many of the pronunciations given in dictionaries are obsolete, and many others have never had any warrant in actual usage. In the present work the editors have taken no such liberties with language, their sole ambition having been to give correct English, as it is spoken by the most cultivated persons and in the most intellectual ranks of society.

7. Obsolete words, and those which are now rarely used in either written or spoken language, are distinguished in this work by an asterisk (*), and those which have been specially coined, or are seldom employed by modern writers and speakers, are marked by an obelisk (†). Cross-references are also inserted where required, and in many cases the past tenses and past participles of the verbs are given in the various forms assumed by them.

8. The question of the insertion of compound words in dictionaries is a most complicated and difficult one. The practice adopted in the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY is, to admit all such compounds or combinations of words as have acquired a special meaning, not readily deducible from the individual meanings of the several words composing them. Of ordinary compounds, the meanings of which are sufficiently obvious, as being merely a combination of words each of which retains its original force, a brief selection has been given at the end of the principal word of the compound.

9. Proper names, when designating only certain definite individuals or places, are not given in the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, it being aside from its purpose to make it a dictionary of biography or of geography. Words of this character have been admitted only when they could claim a place on special grounds; e. g. :—

(1) When, in addition to their original application, they have been given to some other object in nature. Thus Saturn is given on account of the planet which bears his name.

(2) When they form the principal number of a compound word. Thus Aaron's rod (botanical) renders necessary the insertion of the name Aaron.

(3) When they are the names of any of the Books of the Bible; as Isaiah, or Jeremiah.

In the case of words which are derived directly from proper names, a brief account of the person in question is given, either in the etymological portion of the article, or in the definition. Thus a brief account of Arius is given under the word Arian.

10. The close of the twelfth century has been chosen as the limit of past time from which words could be selected as definitely English. At that time, English literature had fallen to its lowest ebb. The half century from 1150 to 1200 A. D. may be, so far as English literature is concerned, likened to the narrow tube connecting two funnels—the language widening backward into Anglo-Saxon, forward into English. This period, therefore, appears at once the proper and the most convenient one to start from. In fact, up to nearly the close of the twelfth century, there was little or no English literature, while by that time the old inflectional and grammatical system of Anglo-Saxon had practically disappeared. The year 1066, that of the Norman invasion, saw the beginning of the deepest mark graven both on our history and our speech. During the succeeding century the Latin element—through the channel of Norman French—made its way into English speech, inflectionalism in great measure disappeared, and the simplified system of modern English superseded the more complex grammatical methods of ancient speech. “Every time almost that we open our lips or write a sentence, we bear witness to the mighty change wrought in England by the Norman conquest.” It is the close of this transition period, when English as it is now spoken first fairly began to be, and when English literature awakened to its modern growth, that appears to be the true starting point of existing English speech, and the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY may claim to present at once the geological development of the English language from its archæan period to the present time, and the natural history of recent English speech.

11. As regards spelling, no attempt has been made to introduce any phonetic system, the ordinarily accepted orthography being preferred. In truth, none of the several phonetic systems advocated have been adopted by the people at large, and the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY aims only to present English as it is, not as word reformers would like it to be, or as it may become in some future time. As full a list as possible has been given under each word of the successive forms of orthography which it has assumed at various periods of its history, thus assisting the word in telling its own story. The abbreviations used are few and simple; a complete list of them is given.

12. What has been hitherto said is limited in great part to the value and advantage of this work as a dictionary of language. It seems proper to say something concerning its utility as an encyclopædia. In this feature it deals with a host of subjects not admitted to ordinary dictionaries, and gives a vast mass of information nowhere else to be found in so compact a form. It gives not only the spelling, pronunciation, etymology, and simple meanings of words, but their obsolete forms, their whole history, and their various uses and relations in ordinary, figurative, technical, scientific and classical language. Of this countless examples might be given. Let us take the word iron. First, we have the historic spelling of the word; second, its derivation; third, its cognate forms. Then the word is defined; first, in ordinary language; second, figuratively; third, technically, as employed in botany, in chemistry, in geology, in history, in mineralogy, and in pharmacy. Then follow the special compounds and their meanings, more than fifty being given which are not found in ordinary dictionaries, including such as iron-age, iron-cage, iron-cross, iron-horse, iron-mask, iron-ore, iron-rations, etc.

In like manner, under the word chronology, we have Chinese and Japanese chronology; Hindoo chronology—historical and astronomical; Egyptian chronology—historical and astronomical; Greek, Roman, Jewish, Mohammedan, Christian, and Scientific chronologies, with a satisfactory account of each. In other dictionaries we find but a brief mention of the word in its ordinary signification.

The following supplementary information will be of importance in the use of this dictionary. The division of words into syllables has been made solely with reference to pronunciation, and does not indicate their etymology. In syllables wherein two or more vowels come together, not forming diphthongs, only that one of them which gives its sound to the syllable bears a diacritical mark, the others being treated as mute. Thus, in brĕad, sĕa, flōat, the a is mute, the syllables being pronounced as if spelt, brĕd, sĕ, flōt. Words of more than one syllable bear a mark upon the accented syllable, as âl'-tĕr.

The ETYMOLOGY will be found inclosed within brackets immediately following each word. To understand the plan adopted, let it be noted (1) that retrogression is made from modern languages to ancient; and (2) that when after a word there appears such a derivation as this: "In Fr . . . , Sp . . . , Port . . . , Ital . . . from Lat . . .," the meaning is, not that it passed through Italian, Portuguese, Spanish and French before reaching English, but that there are or have been analogous words in French, Spanish, Portuguese and Italian, all derived, like the English, from a Latin original.

We have here pointed out some of the features of excellence of the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY, many of them unique in a dictionary of language, while the whole give it a comprehensive value which pertains to no other work of the kind. It is, in short, a library in a work, and can safely be offered alike to the busy student and the general reader as indispensable for their purposes and literary pursuits.

THE PUBLISHER.

PREFATORY NOTE.

The principal points in which the UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY differs from other dictionaries are fully discussed in the Preface, but it may be well to draw attention to the following :

(1) Compound Words are inserted under the first element of the compound, and not in the place they would occupy in strictly alphabetical order, if the second element were taken into account. Thus ANT-BEAR is inserted after ANT, and not after ANTATROPHIC.

(2) The Pronunciation is indicated by diacritical marks, a key to which will be found at the foot of the several pages, but the division into syllables has been based solely on pronunciation, and with no reference to the etymology of the word. In syllables wherein two or more vowels come together, not forming diphthongs, only that one of them which gives its sound to the syllable bears a diacritical mark, the others being treated as mute. Thus, in brĕad, sĕa, flĕat, the a is mute, the syllables being pronounced as if spelt brĕd, sĕ, flĕt. Words of more than one syllable bear a mark upon the accented syllable, as dĭ-ŭtĕr.

(3) The Etymology will be found enclosed within brackets immediately following each word. To understand the plan adopted, let it be noted (1) that retrogression is made from modern languages to ancient; and (2) that when after a word there appears such a derivation as this—"In Fr. . . . Sp. . . . Port. . . . Ital. . . . from Lat. . . .," the meaning is, not that it passed through Italian, Portuguese, Spanish and French before reaching English, but that there are or have been analogous words in French, Spanish, Portuguese and Italian, all derived, like the English, from a Latin original.

UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY

OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE

A

A. a. The first letter in the English alphabet, as in those of all the modern Indo-European tongues. The Latin alphabet also commences with a, and the Greek with a similar letter, α (alpha). In Sanscrit the vowels are classified by grammarians separately from the consonants. The vowels are placed first, and two sounds of a, the first a very short one, intermediate between ā and ä, as in the word Veda, and the other long, as in the first syllable of Brachman, head the list. In the Semitic, also, more accurately called the Syro-Arabian, family of languages, a letter with the a sound stands first in order. Thus the Hebrew alphabet commences with א (Aleph), followed in accession by ב (Beth), ג (Gimel), ד (Daleth), designations which at once suggest the names of the Greek letters Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta. The comparative originality of the Hebrew series is shown by the fact that the spellings of the letters have meanings which the original forms of the characters are supposed roughly to represent; thus, א (Aleph) signifies an ox, ב (Beth) a house, ג (Gimel) a camel, and ד (Daleth) a door. These terms are properly Aramean. The old Hebrew, the Aramean, and the Greek letters seem to have come from the Phœnician, a Syro-Arabian tongue. The Phœnician letters, again, as Gesenius suggests, may have been derived from the Egyptian hieroglyphics. [ALPHABET.] The arrangement which makes A the first letter extends far beyond the Aryan and Syro-Arabian tongues, and is believed to be nearly universal through the world.

I. A as a vowel sound.

A owes its position at the head of so many alphabets to the facility with which it may be pronounced: it is needful but to breathe strongly through the open mouth, and one of the a sounds comes forth. This letter has three leading sounds, two of which again are somewhat modified in many words, apparently by the succeeding consonants.

1. The long sound of A :

(i.) As in fare, marked in this work by ā.
(ii.) A modification of this sound, produced by the consonant r following it, as in fare, marked ā̄.

2. The open sound of A :

(i.) As in father (marked a). This, or a sound much approximating it, is common in many languages.

¶ A trifling modification of this sound is produced by its occurrences in a closed syllable, as in fast, but it is not sufficiently distinct from it to require a special discrial mark.

(ii.) A shorter form of the open sound in a closed syllable, as in fat. It is here marked ä.
(iii.) The shortest possible sound of A, scarcely distinguishable from one of the u sounds, as in amidst. It is here marked a. It is very common in Sanscrit words, as Veda.

3. The broad sound of A :

(i.) As in fall, here marked ā̄.
(ii.) A closer form of it, marked ā̄̄, as in what.

II. A as an initial is used—

1. In Chronology, for Anno (Lat.) = in the year: as A. D., Anno Domini = in the year of our Lord; A. U. C., Anno urbis conditæ = in the year of the city founded—i. e., from the foundation of the city (Rome) = 753 B. C. (Varro).

2. In Horology, for the Lat. prep. ante = before: as a. m. (ante meridiem) = before noon.

3. In designating University degrees, for Artium: as A. M. (Lat.), or M. A. (Eng.), Artium Magister = Master of Arts; A. B. (Lat.), or B. A. (Eng.), Artium baccalaureus = Bachelor of Arts.

¶ In the United States and Scotland A. M. and A. B. are most commonly employed; in England M. A. and B. A.

4. In Academies of Music, Painting, Science, &c.: (a) for Academy, or Academician, as R. A. = Royal Academy; or (b) for Associate, as A. R. A. = Associate of the Royal Academy; or (c) for Antiquaries, as F. S. A. = Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries.

5. In the British Army, for Artillery: as R. A. = The Royal Artillery.

6. In Music, for alto: as S. A. T. B. = Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass.

7. In Nautical Language, for able. Thus, A. B. = able-bodied seaman.

8. In Commerce, for accepted; also @ for at, referring to price; as, 10 lbs. @ 40 cents = $4.00.

III. A as a symbol stands for—

1. In Logic: A universal affirmative.

2. In Music: The 6th note of the diatonic scale of C major, corresponding to the la of the Italians and the French.

3. In Heraldry: The chief in an escutcheon.

4. In Pharmacy: a or āā is a contraction of the Greek preposition ἀνά (ana), and has two meanings: (i.) of each (ingredient) separately; or (ii.) in quantities of the same weight or the same measure.

5. In Botany: According to the method of notation in botanical drawings proposed by Mr. Ferdinand Bauer, and followed by Endlicher in his Iconographia Generum Plantarum, for a flower before expansion, while A 1 is a flower expanded.

6. In Nautical Language: A 1 = a vessel of the first class, excellently built. Figuratively: Anything highly excellent, the best of its class.

7. In Mathematics: A and the other letters of the alphabet are used, e. g., in Euclid, to represent lines, angles, points, &c. In Algebra, a and the other first letters of the alphabet are used to express known quantities, and the last letters to express such as are unknown.

8. In Law or arguments, the first letters of the alphabet are used to indicate persons in cases supposed or stated for illustration: as A promises B to pay C.

IV. A used in composition—

1. As a prefix—

(i.) To English words derived from the A. S., generally means an (= one), at, to, in, of, on. It may be severed from the rest of the word by a hyphen, as a-day; or the two may be completely united, as along. A was once used as a prefix in many instances, especially to participles, where now it is not used: e. g., "I am a-going, or a-coming," are now confined to the vulgar, and are not looked upon as correct. But Max Müller considers such phrases more accurate than those which have displaced them; and they are frequent in the Bible, as Heb. xi. 21. Cf. Shakespeare, Merry Wives, act iii., sc. 3, "We'll a-birding together." "In some cases," says Lye, "it was originally merely an initial segment, altering nothing in the sense of the word." Sometimes it = A. S. ge, as in aware = A. S. gewear.

(ii.) To words derived from the Latin, in (1) the Latin prep. a, ab, abs (of which a is used before words beginning with a consonant): as avert = to turn away from; abstract = to lead away; abstract = to draw away. (2) The Latin prep. ad = to: as agnate, from agnatus, past participle of agnascor = (properly) to be born to, or in addition to.

(iii.) To words of Greek derivation is sometimes what is called alpha privative; that is, alpha which deprives the word to which it is prefixed of its positive meaning, and substitutes what is negative instead. It signifies not: as theist = one who believes in God; atheist = one who does not believe in God. In cases where the word so contradicted begins with a vowel an is used, as anelectric, the opposite of electric.

(iv.) To words derived from the French, occasionally, but rarely, at: as amerce, from Fr. à merci = (put) at the mercy (of the court).

(v.) à [apparently, from its accent, French, but probably really only the Latin prep. a = from; and the accent is a mark of its having come to us in this use through the French], in English, sometimes = from or of. (1.) Occurring as an element in personal names, as Thomas à Kempis, i. e., from Kempfen, near Düsseldorf; Anthony à Wood = Anthony Wood. (2) Logical progression, as in a priori and a posteriori (q. v.).

2. As an affix in burlesque poetry at once adds another syllable to a line, and produces a ludicrous effect—

"And chuck'd him under the chin-a."—Rhymes quoted in Macaulay's "Hist. of Engl.," chap. xvii.

V. A as a part of speech.

A. a, ān. [a before words commencing with a consonant and the aspirate; an before a vowel or silent h: as "a man," "a heart," "an art," "an heir." To this rule there are exceptions:—

(1) When the accent on a word commencing with the aspirate falls on other than the first syllable, an is used: thus we say, "a history," but "an historian," "an hotel."

(2) A is used before the vowel o in one where the vowel carries the sound of wo, as in the phrase "such a one."

(3) A is used before the vowel u when it carries with it a y sound, as if written you, as "a union," "a university;" and also before words commencing with eu or ew which have a similar sound, as "a eunuch," "a ewe."

bēll, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, cēll, chorus, chīn, bench; go, gēm; thin, thīs; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. , ph = f -olan, -lian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = shūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

Originally an, meaning one, was used before words beginning with a consonant, as well as those beginning with a vowel. In earlier English, as in the Bible, we find an generally used before words commencing with h, whether aspirated or not, as "an house," "an heart." "Such an one" occurs as frequently as "such a one." An is found before u with the u sound, as "an unicorn," "an usurer." These uses have been followed by many modern writers, but chiefly in poetry. Macaulay speaks of "an university."

1. As the indefinite article, points out persons and things vaguely; more specifically, it signifies—

- (a) Each. "Once a [i.e., each] year."—Lev. xvi. 34.
- (b) Any. "If a [i.e., any] man love me."—John xiv. 23.
- (c) One in particular. "He sent a man before them."—Ps. cv. 17.
- (d) Every. "It is good that a [i.e., every] man should both hope and wait for the salvation of the Lord."—Lam. iii. 28.

- (a) In the expressions "Capital A, small a."
- (b) In the phrase "A per se" (i.e., A by itself, A standing alone), which means "one pre-eminent, a none-such."

"O fiser Crescidea, the flower and A per se of Troy and Greece."

Chaucer: Tentament of Crescidea, v. 78.

3. As an adjective, as "the a sound."

VI. A as an abbreviation, stands for—

- 1. The interjection ah! (Old Eng.) "And seyd A! daughter, stytnt thyn hevynesse."
Chaucer: The Knightes Tale, l. 2,350.

2. The personal pronoun he: "Bonow would 'a say; and away again would 'a go, and again would 'a come."—Shakespeare: Henry IV., Part II., iii. 2.

3. The infinitive have. [HA'] "I had not thought my body could 'a yielded."—Bosworth & Trenchard.

4. The word all (Scotch): "They have o' th' soldiers to assist them."
Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. v.

5. In Chemistry: A = acetate; as K<sub>2</sub>A = Potassium acetate. Other letters, as O for oxalate, are used in the same manner.

The syllable ab found at the commencement of the names of places, as Abingdon, is possibly a shortened form of abbey; though in Stevenson's edition of the Chronicon Monasterii de Abingdon the word is derived from Abbenus, an Irish monk who is said to have founded the monastery and called it after himself, "Mount of Abbenus" = Abingdon. (See Stevenson's Preface, p. xii.)

Ab (āb). [Heb. אב (ab)] The fifth month according to the ecclesiastical reckoning—the eleventh, by the civil computation—of the Jewish year. The name Ab does not occur in the Old Testament or in the Apocrypha. It was not introduced till the Captivity, and was of Babylonian origin. ¶ Ab is also the twelfth month of the Syrian year, nearly coinciding with our August.

Falconer: Shipwreck.

¶ Taken aback means (a) that the sails have been driven in the opposite direction from that in which the ship is advancing, and laid against the mast. This may be produced by a sudden change of the wind, or by an alteration in the ship's course. A ship is laid aback when the sails are purposely put back to destroy the forward motion of the vessel, or even make her temporarily move stern foremost, to avoid some danger ahead. Ships of war are also laid aback when they have advanced beyond their places in the line of battle. Hence (b) metaphorically from the above = taken by surprise.

†āb-ā-cō, s. Arithmetic. [ABACUS.]

**a-back-ward, a-bac-ward, adv.* [Eng. aback; -ward.] Aback, backward, to the rear.

**āb-a-cōt, ab-o-cooked, ab-o-cock-et*. A spurious word which owes its origin to the fact that Hall, in his Union of the Two Noble and Illustre Families of York and Lancaster, wrongly transcribed the word becocket (q. v.) from Fahyan, as becocket, or that his printer misread the manuscript and, joining the article to the substantive, produced the form abcocket. Fleming corrected this form to abacot, and this error was perpetuated till its exposure in the Athenæum of Feb. 4, 1882.

Law: A stealing of cattle on a large scale. [ABACTOR.]

**āb-āc-tor* (pl. āb-āc-tōr-ēs), s. [Lat. abactor = a cattle-stealer on a large scale; one who drives away herds of cattle: abigo = to drive away; ab = from; ago = to lead or drive.]

"The abactores, or abigatores, who drove one horse or two mares or oxen, or five hogs, or ten goats, were subject to capital punishment."—Gibbon: Decl. & Fall, ch. xlii.

**āb-a-cūs*, s. [Ger. abacus; Fr. abaque; Ital. abaco; Gr. Lat. abacus, Gr. ἀβάξ, -ακος (abax, -akos)] The word appears to have signified originally and specially the Pythagorean multiplication table, and thus to have been derived either from the first two letters of the alphabet, or from the Heb. אב (abag) = dust, or a corresponding term in some other Syro-Arabian language; the etymology being to the ancient practice of spreading dust on tablets, with the view of tracing diagrams among it. Hence its various significations, which are the same in English as they are in Latin.]

ABACUS, FOR COUNTING.

1. A counting-frame; an instrument made of wires and beads designed to facilitate arithmetical calculations. It was used in Greece as well as in Rome, and is still employed in China, where it is called Shwanpan. In our own country an abacus of a humble kind is occasionally sold in toy-shops. [See Wright, in Journ. Archaeological Assoc. II. (1847), 64.]

2. Arch.: A flat stone crowning the capital of a column. It was square in the Tuscan, Doric, and all the ancient Ionic styles. In the Corinthian and Composite orders the sides were hollowed, and the angles in nearly all cases truncated. It is the same in some of the modern Ionic. In the Oregian Doric, the Roman Doric, and the Tuscan, the abacus was thick, while it was thin in the Doric and Corinthian. It was to these last forms that Vitruvius, the Roman writer, who introduced the word abacus into architectural nomenclature, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūta, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

Ducange cites instances of its perpetration among the Italians in mediæval times, the Greeks of the lower empire, and others. abbé, (pron. ăb-bă), s. [The French term for ABBOT.] Literally, the same as an abbot, but more generally a mere title for any clergyman without any definite office or responsibilities. Before the first French Revolution the title was so fashionable that many men who had pursued a course of theological study, though not at all of ecclesiastical proclivities, assumed it; but that practice almost terminated with 1789, after which the word became once more limited to its natural meaning.
"Ere long some bowing, smirking, smart Abbé."
Cowper: Progress of Error.
† Abbés Comendataires. [ABBOT.]

* ăb-böss, s. [O. Fr. abasse, abbesse; Low Lat. abbatissa.] The lady superior of a nunnery, exercising the same authority over the nuns that an abbot does over monks in a convent, the only exception being that she cannot exercise strictly ecclesiastical functions.
"The Palmer ought the Abbess' eye."
Scott: Marmion, v. 14.

* ăb-beŷ, s. [O. Fr. abeie, abaie; Fr. abbaye, from Low Lat. abbatia; Itsl. abbazia or badia; Ger. Abtei.]
1. A monastic community. A society of celibates of either sex, who, having withdrawn from "the world" and bound themselves by religious vows, henceforth live in seclusion, the men, termed monks, in a convent, and the females, denominated nuns, in a nunnery, the former ruled over by an abbot [ABBOT], and the latter by an abbess. Originally the term abbey was applied to all such fraternities or sisterhoods, then it became more limited in meaning, as a distinction was drawn between an abbey proper and a priory. The more powerful abbeys in the Middle Ages tended to throw out offshoots, as a vigorous church now is pretty sure to found one or more humbler churches in its vicinity. These were called priories, and were ruled by priors, which was a more modest dignity than that of abbot. For a period they were subject to the authority of the abbot by whose instrumentality they had been founded, then they gained strength and became independent of the parent monastery, and finally the distinction between an abbey and a priory almost vanished. [MONASTERY.]

2. A building either now or formerly inhabited by a monastic community. An abbey in the Middle Ages had a church, a dormitory, a refectory for meals, a proper pantry for viands, and all other conveniences for the monks, who, though individually poor, were collectively rich. It stood in the midst of grounds walled round for protection and privacy. Some abbeys have been converted into modern cathedrals or churches, others are in ruins. [PRIORY, CONVENT, NUNNERY, MONASTERY.]
"It is impossible to conceive a more beautiful specimen of lightness and elegance of Gothic architecture than the eastern window of Melrose Abbey."—Scott: Notes to "Lay of Last Minstrel", II, 5.
† In the mouth of a Londoner, "the Abbey" signifies Westminster Abbey.
"All the steeples from the Abbey to the Tower sent forth a joyous din."—Beaumont: Hist. of Eng., chap. xi.
† In Scotland, "the Abbey" specially means Holyrood House. [ABBEY-LAIRD.]

3. The privileges of sanctuary possessed by those repairing to any such building.
Scotts Law: The right of sanctuary afforded to a debtor who lives within the precincts of Holyrood House.

abbey-laird, s. A cant term for an insolvent debtor who takes up his residence within the precincts of Holyrood as a protection against his creditors. (Scotch.)

abbey-land, s. Land now, or formerly, attached to an abbey. On the suppression of the monasteries at the period of the English Reformation, the abbey-lands were transferred to the Crown, and were soon afterwards given, at prices beneath their value, to private persons. By the statute 1st Phil. & Mary, c. 8, any one molesting the possessors of abbey-lands, granted by Parliament to Henry VIII. or Edward VI., incurred the penalty of a premunire. While yet the lands now referred to were attached to the respective abbeys, their possessors, in most cases, had succeeded in freeing them from all charge for tithes. When their modern owners manage to prove this they also are exempt from tithes. (See Blackstone's Commentaries, Book IV., ch. 8; Book II., ch. 3.)

abbey-lubber, s. A term of contempt for a fat, lazy, idle monk. Jennings says it is still used to Somerset for an idle fellow.

"This is no Father Dominic, no huge overgrown abbey-lubber; this is but a diminutive, sucking friar."
—Dryden: Spanish Friar, III, 2.

† Besides abbey-land and abbey-lubber there are in English literature a number of other words compounded with abbey; for instance, abbey-church and abbey-plate (Froude), abbey-gate and abbey-wall (Shakespeare).

* ăb-bôt, * ăb-bat, or * ăb-ôt. [A.S. abbod, abbad; Ger. abt; Fr. abbé; Itsl. abate; Low Lat. abbas, fr. E. and W. Aram. abba; Heb. אב (ab) = father, of which the plural sounds like abbot, אבות (aboth).] [ABBA.]
A term originally applied to any monk, or to any ecclesiastic, specially if aged, and designed to express veneration for his sanctity; then limited to the superior of a society of monks living in a monastery; next restricted still further to the ruler of an abbey as contradistinguished from a priory; and, finally, acquiring again a somewhat more extended meaning as the distinction between an abbey and a priory became less regarded. [ABBEY, PRIORY.]

When in the fourth century, A.D., the scattered and solitary monks living in the Egyptian and other deserts began to be gathered into small communities, each society elected a spiritual chief over it, to whom the name abbot was given by the Syrians and others, and archimandrite by the Greeks. The bishop soon gained the right of confirming the nomination. As yet the abbots were deemed laymen, but about the sixth century most of them became priests. After the second Nicene Council, in A.D. 787, they were allowed to consecrate monks for the lower sacred orders. The abundant leisure which they possessed led a few of them to become learned men, and the bishops finding them useful in controversies with "heretics," gradually induced them to remove their monasteries to the vicinity of towns. By the eleventh century their influence had so increased that the more powerful of them succeeded in shaking off the authority of the bishops, owing no jurisdiction now but that of the Pope; these were, in consequence, called insulated abbots. Though nominally the next grade below bishops, yet most of them adopted the episcopal crosier, which, however, they bore in their right hand, while the bishops did so in their left. They also assumed mitres like their rivals, and even many ordinary abbots became crosiers; thus a distinction arose between mitred and crosiered abbots. The house presided over by insulated abbots had mostly sent forth priories; the heads of those which had done so on a large scale were sometimes called cardinal abbots; and the ambitious title of ecumenical, meaning universal abbot, imitated from the patriarch of Constantinople, was not unknown. The privilege of making appointments to posts of such importance was claimed, and in many places successfully, by the civil power, which then nominated laymen for secular ends. Hence arose abbot-counts (in Lat. abba- or abbi-comites) and field-abbots (in Lat. abbates milites), who received appointments on condition of rendering military service for what was deemed their fief. In Germany there were prince abbots, and Kings Philip I. and Louis VI. of France were abbots of the monastery of St. Aignan.

In England, before the Reformation, twenty-six or twenty-seven mitred abbots, with two priors, sat in the House of Lords; the former were called, in consequence, abbots-general, or abbots-sovereigns. They ceased to be peers when the monasteries were suppressed by Henry VIII.

Bishops whose cathedrals were at one time abbeys have sometimes been called abbots.

In modern Roman Catholic countries abbots are generally divided into regular and commendatory (abbes commendataires). The former are really monks; the latter are only laymen, but are obliged to take orders when they have reached the right age.

Abbot of the People was a title formerly given in Genoa to one of the chief civil magistrates, a layman. A person who in mediæval times was the leader of Christmas revels was called by the English the Abbot or Lord of Misrule, by the Scotch the Abbot of Unreason, and by the French Abbé de Liesse or the Abbot of Joy. I. Transitive:

1. Gen.: To relinquish, abandon, give up.

2. Spec.: To relinquish the throne without resigning it. After the flight of James II., in 1689, Lord Chancellor Somers, Maynard, and other eminent men, contended that the fugitive monarch had abdicated the throne, and induced the House of Commons to adopt the following extraordinary definition of the verb to abdicate:—

"It was moved that King James II., having endeavored to subvert the constitution of the kingdom by breaking the original contract between king and people, and, by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws, and having withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, had abdicated the government, and that the throne had thereby become vacant."—Macaulay: Hist. of Eng. Chap.

It was not, however, at a logical definition that Somers and his companions aimed, but at framing a motion likely to pass the House, as this one triumphantly did.

The word abdicate is sometimes used for the desertion of offices inferior to the throne.

3. Formally to resign an office before one's time of service has expired, or an office which one might have been expected to retain till death.

1. Spec.: The relinquishment of an office, and particularly the throne, without a formal resignation. It differs from resignation, which is applied to the giving back by a person into the hands of a superior an office to which that superior appointed him; while in abdication, one theoretically, without an earthly superior in the country, relinquishes what came to him at first by act of law.

"Somers vindicated the use of the word abdication by quotations from Grotius and Brissonius, Spigelius and Bartolus."—Muonaiay: Hist. of Eng., ch. x.

2. The resignation of a throne or other office with or without due formalities.

1. That portion of the trunk which in man commences beneath, and in mammals behind the diaphragm, and terminates at the extremity of the pelvis. The abdominal cavity is the largest in the human body. It is lined with a serous membrane called the peritoneum. It contains the liver, with the gall-bladder under its right lobe, the stomach, the pancreas, the spleen, the two kidneys, the bladder, and the intestines. The more highly organised of the inferior animals have a similar structure.

2. Entom.: The whole posterior division of the body united to the thorax by a small knot or attachment, well seen in the wasp. It includes the back as well as the parts below. Externally it is made up of a series of rings.

"... the size of the abdominal cavity."—Todd and Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. ii., p. 296.

Abdominal regions: Certain regions on the external surface of the abdomen formed by the tracing upon it of imaginary lines. A line is drawn horizontally from the extremity of the last rib on one side to the same point on the other. A second line is then drawn parallel to the first between the two anterior superior processes of the ilium. These two lines necessarily divide the abdomen into three horizontal bands or zones. The first or highest one is called the epigastrum [EPIGASTRIUM]; the second or middle one, the umbilical region [UMBILICAL]; and the third or lowest the hypogastrum [HYPOGASTRIUM]. Two vertical lines are then drawn on either side from the cartilage of the seventh rib downward to the anterior superior spine of the ilium. These necessarily intersect the three horizontal zones, dividing each of them into three parts so as to make nine in all. The central division of the epigastrum constitutes the epigastric region, properly so called, on either side of which lie the right and left hypochondria [HYPOCHONDRIA]. The central portion of the umbilical region is the umbilical region properly so called; whilst the compartments on either side are named the right and left inbar regions. The hypogastric region is similarly divided into three, the central called the pelvic region, and the two side ones the right and left iliac regions.

Abdominal ring or inguinal ring: One of two oblong tendinous openings or "rings" existing in either groin. Through these rings pass the spermatic cord in the one sex, and the circular ligament of the uterus in the other. The spongerotic fibres which form the immediate boundaries of the two openings are called the pillars of the ring. One of these is superior, internal or anterior, and the other inferior, external and posterior.

1. Optics. Spherical aberration: That wandering of the rays of light from the normal path which takes place when they are made to pass through curved lenses, or are reflected from curved mirrors, constituting portions of a sphere, instead of parts of a parabola. It arises from the unequal refraction by the lenses of the several rays of light, and its effect is to render the images formed in some degree undefined about the edges. Chromatic aberration [Gr. χρώμα (chrōma) = colour.]: That fringing of images with the prismatic colours which takes place when light passes through curved lenses. It arises from the unequal refraction by the lenses of the several elementary colours. Both spherical and chromatic aberration may be corrected by the employment of a proper combination of lenses instead of one. [ACHROMATIC.]

2. Astron.: The aberration of light is that alteration in the apparent position of a star which is produced by the motion of the earth in its orbit during the time that the light is coming from the star to the eye. The effect of this aberration is to make each star appear annually to describe a minute circle of about 40" diameter parallel to the earth's diameter.

3. Terrestrial physics: The aberration of light may be seen on the earth as well as in the heavens. If one walk rapidly forward in a shower, the raindrops seem as if they come at an angle to meet him; if he walk swiftly backwards, they appear as if they come at an inclination from behind; if, finally, he stand still, their real motion becomes discernible; in other words, they appear to fall nearly or quite vertically.

1. Law: The expectancy of an estate. In abeyance is the term applied to a freehold or inheritance which is not for the time being vested in any one, but which awaits the appointment or the competence of the person who is entitled to the possession. * āb-hōm-in-ā-ble, a. [ABOMINABLE.] A pedantic spelling of the word ABOMINABLE, formerly used by those who erroneously believed the etymology to be ab-homine instead of abominor. It is thus ridiculed by Shakespeare:

"This is abominable, which he [Arnado] would call abominable."—Love's Labour's Lost, V. 1.

āb-hor, v.t. [Fr. abhorrer; Sp. aborecer; Ital. abborrire; all from Lat. abhorreo = to shrink back from; ab = from, and horreo = (1) to stand erect, bristle up; (2) tremble as with cold; (3) shudder at, as in fear.]

I. The act of forswearing, abjuring, or renouncing upon oath; a denial upon oath, a renunciation upon oath. Chiefly a law term, and used in the following senses:—

1. An abjuration of the realm. During the Middle Ages the right of sanctuary was conceded to criminals. A person fleeing to a church or churchyard might permanently escape trial, if, after confessing himself guilty before the coroner, he took an oath abjuring the kingdom, i. e., promising forthwith to embark, at an assigned port, for a foreign land, and never to return unless by the king's permission. By this abjuration the blood of the criminal was attainted, and he forfeited all his goods and chattels. This system of procedure was modified in the reign of Henry VIII., and entirely swept away in that of James I.

2. Spec.: An abjuration or renunciation of all imagined allegiance to the Jacobite line of rulers, after the nation had given its verdict in favour of William and Mary.

"An Abjuration Bill of extreme severity was brought into the House of Commons."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

The oath of abjuration was fixed by 13 Wm. III., c. 16. By the 21 & 22 Vict., c. 48, one form of oath was substituted for the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration. For this form another was substituted by the Act 30 & 31 Vict., c. 75, s. 5. This has in turn been superseded by the Promissory Oaths Act, 31 & 32 Vict., c. 72, by which a new form of the oath of allegiance is provided.

3. An abjuration, renunciation, or retraction of real or imagined heresy or false doctrine. Thina the now abolished 25 Chas. II., c. 2, enacted that certain tenets of the Church of Rome were to be solemnly renounced. This is sometimes called an Abjuration Act, but the term is more appropriately confined to that mentioned under No. 2.

4. In a popular sense: A more or less formal giving up.

II. The state of being abjured.

III. The document containing a solemn renunciation on oath of a person or doctrine.

"As it was, he committed to the Fleet on the charge of having used heretical language. An abjuration was drawn up by Wolsey, which he signed."—Froude: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

(2.) To renounce a pretender. Spec.: To renounce allegiance to James II. and his successors, after the nation had pronounced in favour of William and Mary. [ABJURATION (2).]

(a) The sixth and last case in the Latin language. An extant fragment of Julius Cæsar's De Analogia informs us that he was the inventor of the term in Latin. He found time to introduce it during his Gallic War. The ablative case expresses a variety of relations, such as separation, instrumentality, position in time and place, and these we express in English by the prepositions from, by, with, in, at, &c.

(b) Pertaining to the sixth case in the Latin language.

¶ The word is, no doubt, originally an adjective, as in Latin; but as in that language there is frequently an ellipse of the substantive casus, so in English we find ablative standing by itself, and it is thus used—

II. As a substantive:

"The ablative denotes the moving cause."—Schmittz: Lat. Gram., § 291.

¶ The ablative absolute is a mode of expression in Latin by which, in an subordinate clause detached from the rest, the subject is put in the ablative, and the verb is changed into a participle, and made to agree with it: as, Reluctante naturā irritus labor est = exertion is useless, nature being against it, i. e., when nature is against it.

¶ There is an ablative in the Chinese as well as the Latin language. (See Max Müller.)

"... the absence of mediary canals in the long bones in the cloths."—Owen: Classific. of Mammalia.

3. Law: Failure to put in an appearance when cited to a court of law.

4. Inattention to things present. Often a person charged with "absence of mind" has his mind intensely present in some imagined scene or train of thought quite different from that with which the rest of the company are occupied. From their point of view, therefore, he manifests "absence of mind." In other cases the absent person is not particularly attending to anything, but is simply in a lethargic mood. In the same way we speak of an "absence of all thought."

I. Ordinary Language. Applied—

1. To God: Self-existent and completely uncontrolled by any other being.

"In judging of God's dispensation we must not look merely at his absolute sovereignty."—Blunt: Dict. Hist. & Theol., art. "Decrees Eternal."

2. To a sovereign or sovereignty, or power in general: Uncontrolled, unchecked by any other human powers; arbitrary, despotic.

"... either the king must become absolute, or the Parliament must control the whole executive administration."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. 1.

* 3. To a person:

(a) Absolved, freed. (Chaucer.)

(b) Highly accomplished, perfect.

"... still This Philoten contends in skill With absolute Maria." Shaksp.: Pericles, IV. Prologue.

4. To a mental state, a quality, &c.: Unlimited.

"Faith absolute in God."—Wordsworth: Excurs., bk. IV.

"I'm absolute Twice very Cloten." Shaksp.: Cymbeline, IV. 2.

6. Unconditional.

"... the words of his mouth are absolute, and lack nothing which they should have for performance of that thing wherunto they tend."—Hooker: Eccles. Pol., II. 2.

II. Logic.

1. Absolute or Non-connotative is opposed to Attributive or Connotative. The former does not take note of an attribute connected with the object, which the latter does. Thus Rome and sky are absolute terms; but Rome, the capital of Italy, and our sky are attributive or connotative. (See Whately, Logic, bk. II., ch. v., §§ 1, 2–5.)

2. According to J. S. Mill, it is incorrect to regard non-connotative and absolute as synonymous terms. He considers absolute to mean non-relative, and to be opposed to relative. It implies that the object is to be considered as a whole, without reference to anything of which it is a part, or to any other object distinguished from it. Thus man is an absolute term, but father is not, for father implies the existence of sons, and is therefore relative. (J. S. Mill, Logic, bk. I., ch. II.)

III. Metaph.: Existing independently of any other cause.

"This asserts to man a knowledge of the unconditioned, the absolute and infinite."—Sir W. Hamilton: Discussions, &c., Appendix I.

In this case the word has a substantival meaning, and is often used as = The Great First Cause.

IV. Gram.: A case absolute is one consisting essentially of a substantive and a participle, which form a clause not agreeing with or governed by any word in the remainder of the sentence. In Greek, the absolute case is the genitive; in Latin, the ablative; in English, it is considered to be the nominative.

In Latin, the words sole stante in the expression, "sole stante terra vertitur" (the earth turns round, the sun standing still)—that is, whilst the sun is standing still—are in the ablative absolute.

In English, thou leading, in the words—

"I shall not lag behind, nor err The way, thou leading" (Milton) are in the nominative absolute. So also are I rapt in the line—

"And, I all rapt in this, 'Come out,' he said." Tennyson: Princess, Fr. 60.

V. Law: Personal rights are divided into absolute and relative: absolute, which pertain to men as individuals; and relative, which are incident to them as members of society, standing in various relations to each other. The three chief rights of an absolute kind are the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right of private property. (Blackstone, Comment., bk. I., ch. 1.) Similarly there are absolute and relative duties. Public sobriety is a relative duty, whilst sobriety, even when no human eye is looking on, is an absolute duty. (Ibid.) Property in a man's possession is described under two categories, absolute and qualified property. His chairs, tables, spoons, horses, cows, &c., are his absolute property; while the term qualified property is applied to the wild animals on his estate.

An absolute decision is one which can at once be enforced. It is opposed to a rule nisi, which cannot be acted on until cause be shown, unless, indeed, the opposite party fail to appear.

Absolute law: The true and proper law of nature.

Absolute warranty (Scotch conveyancing): A warranting or assuring against all mankind.

VI. Nat. Philosophy: Absolute is generally opposed to relative. As this relativity may be of many kinds, various shades of meaning thus arise: thus—

1. Absolute or real expansion of a liquid, as opposed to its apparent expansion, the expansion which would arise when the liquid is heated, if the vessel containing it did not itself expand. (See Atkinson, Gannet's Physics, bk. VI., ch. III.)

2. Absolute gravity is the gravity of a body viewed apart from all modifying influences, as, for instance, of the atmosphere. To ascertain its amount, therefore, the body must be weighed in vacuo.

3. Absolute motion is the change of place on a body produced by the motion so designated, viewed apart from the modifying influence arising from disturbing elements of another kind.

4. Absolute space is space considered apart from the material bodies in it.

5. Absolute time is time viewed apart from events or any other subjects of mental conception with which it may be associated.

6. Absolute force of a centre: Strength of a centre (q. v.).

VII. Astron.: The absolute equation is the aggregate of the optic and eccentric equations. [EQUATIONS, OPTIC, ECCENTRIC.]

VIII. Algebra: Absolute numbers are those which stand in an equation without having any letters combined with them. Thus, in the following equation—

2x + 9 = 17,

9 and 17 are absolute numbers, but 2 is not so.

IX. Chem.: Absolute alcohol is alcohol free from water.

abs-tract, a. [In Ger. abstract, abstrakt; Fr. abstrait; Lat. abstractus = dragged away, pa. par. of abstraho = to drag or pull away.] [ABSTRACT, v.t.]

A. Used as an adjective:

I. In Ordinary Language and Poetry:

1. Gen.: Abstracted, separated, viewed apart from.

(a) From other persons or things of a similar kind.

"... the considering things in themselves, abstract from our opinions and other men's notions and discourses on them."—Locke.

(b) From reference to an individual.

"Love's not so pure and abstract as they use to say Which has no mistress but their name."
—Donne: Poems, 27.

2. Poet.: For abstracted; absent in mind, like one in a trance (pron. áb-stráct).

"Abstract, as in a trance, abstrahit I saw, Though sleeping, where I lay, and saw the shape."
Milton: Par. Lost, bk. viii.

3. Separate; existing in the mind only; hence with the sense of difficult, abstruse.

II. Logic and Grammar:

1. In a strict sense: Expressing a particular property of any person or thing viewed apart from the other properties which constitute him or it. Thus depth is an abstract term. Used of the sea, it means that the property of the sea expressed by the word depth is viewed apart from the other properties of the ocean. So is blueness an abstract word. In this sense abstract is opposed to concrete. This use of the term was introduced by the Schoolmen, and was highly approved by Mr. John Stuart Mill, who employed the word in no other sense in his "Logic."

Abstract Nouns: The last of the five classes into which nouns may be divided, the others being (1) proper, singular, or meaningless nouns; (2) common, general, or significant nouns; (3) collective nouns; and (4) material nouns. Most abstract nouns are derived from adjectives, as whiteness from white, height from high, roundness from round; these are called adjective abstract nouns, or adjective abstracts. Others come from verbs, as creation from create, and tendency from tend; these are denominated verbal abstract nouns, or verbal abstracts. Abstract nouns have properly no plural. When used in the plural this is an indication that they have lost their abstract character and gained a concrete meaning, so that they are now common or general nouns. (See Bain's Higher Eng. Gram.)

2. In a loose sense: Resulting from the mental faculty of abstraction, general as opposed to particular. The term is used even when the idea conceived of as separate from all other with which it is associated is not a quality. In this sense reptile, star, and money are abstract or general words, though none of the three is a quality. Locke did much to bring this looser sense of the word into currency. It is censured by John S. Mill (Logic, Bk. I., ch. ii., § 4).

"The mind makes the particular ideas received from particular objects to become general; which is done by considering them as they are in the mind, such appearance, separate from all other existences and the circumstances of real existence, as time, place, or any other concomitant ideas. This is called abstraction, whereby ideas taken from particular beings become general representatives of all of the same kind, and their names general names, applicable to whatever exists conformable to such abstract ideas."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. ii., ch. xi., § 3.

† Abstract science: A term applied to mathematics.

"Another discriminates mathematical properties, and he addicts himself to abstract science."—Isaac Taylor: Elements of Thought (1846), p. 20.

Abstract or Pure Mathematics: Mathematics, which treats of number or quantity viewed as standing alone, as is done in geometry and arithmetic. It is contradistinguished from mixed mathematics, in which these are viewed as modified by the physical properties of the bodies in which they inhere. This is done in mechanics, hydrostatics, optics, &c.

Abstract Numbers: Numbers considered in themselves without reference to any persons or things with which they may be conjoined. Thus three is an abstract number, but if conjoined with men it becomes concrete.

B. Used as a substantive:

1. Logic: An abstract name, as opposed to one which is concrete. [See CONCRETE.]

"Each of them [of the concrete terms] has or might have a corresponding abstract name to denote the attribute conjoined by the concrete. Thus the concrete 'like' has its abstract 'likeness'; the concrete 'father' and 'son' have or might have the abstracts 'paternity' and 'filiiety or filiation.'"—Mill: Logic, p. 45.

In the abstract, or (less frequently) in abstract, signifies in a state of separation, the looking at an idea apart from all other ideas with which it may be more or less intimately connected. It is opposed to in the concrete, which, however, is rarely used.

"Honest. So the old gentleman blushed, and said, Not Honesty in the abstract, but Honest is my name."—Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

"The hearts of great princes, if they be considered, as if in abstract, without the necessity of states and circumstances of time."—J. H. Weston.

2. A summary, an epitome, a compendium of a book or document.

"The abstract of the papers was read by the clerk."—Macaulay: Hist. of Eng., ch. xix.

"I have been urged to publish this abstract."—Darwin: Orig. of Species (1859), Introduction.

"Neither press, coffee, chest, trunk, well, vault, but he hath an abstract for the remembrance of such places, and goes to them by his note."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iv. 2.

† In Shakespeare (Hamlet, ii. 2), play-actors are called the "abstract" for in some copies the abstracts or brief chronicles of the time, perhaps because they acted history on a much smaller stage than that of the world, and in briefer time than the events which they reproduced really occupied.

Abstract of Title (Law): An epitome of the evidences of ownership. An abstract should show the soundness of a person's right to a given estate, together with any charges or circumstances in any wise affecting it. A perfect abstract discloses that the owner has both the legal and equitable estates at his own disposal perfectly unencumbered. The object of any abstract is to enable the purchaser or mortgagee, or his counsel, to judge of the evidence deducing and of the encumbrances affecting the title. (Wharton: Law Lexicon.)

* Abstract of a Fine. [FINE.]

* Abstract of Pleas: An epitome of the pleas used or to be used against the pleas of one's opponent.

* 4. An extract or a smaller quantity containing the essence of a larger.

"If you are false, these epithets are small; You're then the things, and abstract of them all."
—Dryden: Aurungzeb, iv. 1.

"A man, who is the abstract of all faults That all men follow."

II. Tech. (In Logic): A scholastic term employed when false conclusions are illogically deduced from the premises of the opponent. In this sense it is sometimes used in what are known as indirect demonstrations of propositions in geometry, where the proposition is shown to be true, by proving that any supposition to the contrary would lead to an absurdity; sa, "Because in the triangle C B D the side B C is equal to the side B D, the angle B D C is equal to the angle B C D; but B D C has been proved to be greater than the same B C D; therefore the angle B D C is at the same time equal to, and greater than the angle B C D, which is absurd." The term is borrowed from the Latin absurdum in the phrase "reductio ad absurdum" (q.v.). Impossible, however, is more frequently used in this way than absurd.

* āb-thāne, s. [Gael. abhàine = an abbacy; Low Lat. abthania.] Properly an abbacy, but commonly used as a title of dignity; as, "Superior or High Thane." Fordun, in his Scotochronicon, iv. 39, first used the title abthania to express the person holding an abthania, which he took to be an office or dignity. The word and its history are clearly explained by Dr. Skene in his Historians of Scotland, vol. iv.; Fordun, pt. II., p. 413. Minshew renders the word "steward." Jmsieson in his Scottish Dictionary, argues that ab in this word implies inferiority, and not superiority. The abthane pre-eminently so called had, however, a high position, being the High Steward of Scotland. Speaking of this functionary, Fordun says, "Under the king, he was the superior of those who were bound to give an annual account of their farms and rents due to the king." (Fordun, bk. IV., ch. xliii.)

1. The people of Abyssinia.

2. A sect of Christians consisting chiefly of the dominant race in the country from which the name is derived. The Monophysites, or those who believe that Christ possessed but one nature, are divided into two leading communions—the Copts and the Abyssinians. The Abyssinians look up to the Alexandrian patriarch as their spiritual father, and allow him to nominate over them an ecclesiastical ruler called Abuna. [ABUNA.] The doctrines of the Abyssinians are the same as those of the Coptic church, but several peculiar rites are observed. The oldest churches are hewn out of the rock. Like the Greeks, the Abyssinians do not tolerate statues, but paintings are numerous.

*ab-ýt, s. [An old spelling of HABIT.] Raiment, dress, apparel.

"In abyt maned with chastité and schame Ye womenen schuld apparel you."—Chaucer: C. T., 5, 924.

A.C., in Chronology, is ambiguous. It may stand (1) for Ante Christum = before Christ; or (2) for Anno Christi = in the year of Christ, i. e., in the year of the Christian era; or (3), for After Christ, as B. C. stands for Before Christ. It should not be used without an explanation of the sense in which it is to be taken.

*ac, conj. [A. S. ac.] But, and, also.

ac in composition.

A. As a prefix:

I. In Anglo-Saxon proper names. [A. S. ac, ac = an oak.] An oak, as Acton = oak town. In this sense it is sometimes varied, as ak or ake. [A. S. ac.]

II. In words from the Latin:

1. Most commonly as a euphonic change for ad: as accommodate, fr. accommodo = ad + commodo = to fit to.

2. Sometimes from an obsolete root = sharp: as in acid, acrid, &c.

B. As a suffix (Gr.)—

(1.) To adjectives: Pertaining to, having the property or the energy of, that can or may; hence, that does: as ammoniac = having the energy of ammonia.

(2.) To substantives: One who or that which has or does: as maniac = one who has mania; polemak = one who makes war.

a-các-a-lis, s. [Gr. ákakalis (akakalis) = the white tamarisk.]

Phar.: A name given by some authors to the wild carob.

a-các-a-lót, or áe-a-lót, s. [Mexican.] An American bird, the Tantalus Mexicanus of Gmelin.

a-cá-çl-a (ç as sh), s. [In Ger. akazie; Fr., Lat., and Sp. acacia = (1) the acacia-tree, (2) the gum; Gr. ákakia (akakia), fr. ákē (akē) = a point or edge.]

† 1. The Acacia vera, or true acacia of the ancients; probably the Acacia Nilotica, the Egyptian thorn.

BRANCH OF ACACIA ARABICA.

2. Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the Mimosæ, one of the leading divisions of the great Leguminous order of plants. They abound in Australia, in India, in Africa, tropical America, and generally in the hotter regions of the world. Nearly 300 species are known from Australia alone. They are easily cultivated in greenhouses, where they flower for the most part in winter or early spring. The type is perhaps the Acacia Arabica, or gum-arabic tree, common in India and Arabia. It looks very beautiful with its graceful doubly pinnate leaves, and its heads of flowers like little velvety pellets of bright gamboge hue. It is the species referred to by Moore:

(a) Literally:

"Our rocks are rough, but smiling there Th' acacia waves her yellow hair, Lonely and sweet, nor loved the less For flowering in a wilderness."—Moore: Lalla Rookh (Light of the Haram).

(b) Figuratively:

"Then come—thy Arab maid will be The loved and lone acacia-tree."—Ibid.

Other species than the A. Arabica produce gum-arabic. That of the shops is mostly derived from the A. vera, a stunted species growing in the Atlas mountains and other parts of Africa. [GUM.] A. Verek and A. Adansoni yield gum Senegal. [GUM.] A. Catechu furnishes catechu. [CATECHU.] Other species contain tannin, and are used in tanning. Others yield excellent timber. The pods of A. concinna are used in India for washing the head, and its acid leaves are employed in cookery. The bark of A. Arabica is a powerful tonic; that of A. ferruginea and A. leucophaea, with jagghery water superadded, yields an intoxicating liquor. The fragrant flowers of A. Farnesiana, when distilled, produce a delicious perfume.

3. The Acacia of English gardens: The Robinia pseudo-Acacia, a papilionaceous tree, with unequally pinnate leaves, brought from North America, where it is called the Locust-tree.

4. Phar.: (1) The inspissated juice of the unripe fruit of the Mimosa Nilotica. It is brought from Egypt in roundish masses wrapped up in thin bladders. The people of that country use it in spitting of blood, in quins, and in weakness of the eyes. (2) Gum arabic. (3) German acacia: The juices of unripe sloes inspissated. (4) Acacia flores: The blossoms of the sloe.

2. A sect which derived its name from Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople from A.D. 471 to A.D. 488. He acted in a conciliatory way to the Monophysites, and was in consequence deemed a heretic by the Roman pontiff and the Western Church, who ultimately succeeded in obtaining the erasurement of his name from the sacred registers.

"... lost himself in the mazes of the old Academic philosophy."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

The Academic Philosophy was that taught by Plato in the "Academy" at Athens. [ACADEMY.] It was idealist as opposed to realist, materialist, or sensationist. Plato believed in an intelligent First Cause, the author of spiritual being and of the material world, to whom he ascribed every perfection. He greatly commended virtue, and held the pre-existence and the immortality of the immaterial part of our nature. No ancient philosophy so readily blended with Christianity as that of Plato.

From academic bowers."

¶ The word academician is frequently used also to designate a member of the celebrated French Academy or Institute, established by Cardinal Richelieu in 1635, for fixing and polishing the French language. [ACADEMY.]

1. The academy where Plato taught.
2. Any academy of the modern type.
"My man of morals, nurtured in the shades
Of Academeus—is this false or true?"
Cowper: Task, book ii.

a-câd-ê-m'y, s. [In Gr. akadēmiē; Fr. académie; Sp. academia; Ital. accademia; Lat. academia; Gr. ακαδημία (akadēmiā) = the gymnasium in the suburbs of Athens in which Plato taught, and so called after a hero, by name Academeus, to whom it was said to have originally belonged.]

I. The gymnasium just described, which was about three quarters of a mile from Athens, and at last was beautifully adorned with groves and walks, shaded by umbrageous trees. The spot is still called Academia. For the doctrines there taught, see ACADEMIC PHILOSOPHY.

2. Modern: e.g., the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. Sometimes used also for a private school.

III. A society or an association of artists linked together for the promotion of art, or of scientific men similarly united for the advancement of science, or of persons united for any more or less analogous object. Thus the French possess the celebrated Academy or Institute, established by Cardinal Richelieu in 1635, for fixing and polishing the French language. In our own country are the Royal Academy of Arts [ACADEMICIAN], the Academy of Music, &c. The use of the word academy, different from the ancient one, is believed to have arisen first in Italy at the revival of letters in the fifteenth century.

IV. The building where the pupils of a high school meet, or where such an association for the promotion of science and art as those just mentioned is held: e.g., "The Academy, which was one of the ornaments of the town, caught fire, and was in danger of being burnt down."

defined as zoophytes which swim in the sea, and in the organisation of which some vessels are perceived which are most frequently only productions of the intestines, hollowed in the parenchyma of the body. They were divided into Aculephæ simplices and A. hydrostaticæ: the first contained the genera Medusa, Eurepore, &c.; and the latter, Physalia, Diphyes, and others. They are now combined with the hydroid polypes to form the class Hydrozoa. They fall under Huxley's Siphonophora, Discophora, and probably a third as yet unnamed order, to contain the animals called by Hæckel Trachymeduse. Of Aculephæ may be mentioned the genus Medusa, of which the species on our coasts are called "jelly-fish," from their jelly-like aspect; and the Physalia, or Portuguese man-of-war, which is common to more southern latitudes.

They have the first portion of the dorsal fin, if there is but one, supported by spinal rays; if there are two, then the whole of the anterior one consists of spinous rays. The anal fin has also some spinous rays, and the ventral one. The order contains about three-fourths of all the known species of fishes. Cuvier included under it fifteen families, and Dr. Gunther makes it consist of five great groups, the first containing forty-eight families or sub-families, and the second, third, fourth, and fifth, one each. placentæ, and has from one or two to many seeds. There are often large leafy bracts. The Acanthaceæ are mostly tropical plants, many of them being Indian. They have both a resemblance and an affinity to the Scrophulariaceæ of this country, but are distinguishable at once by being prickly and spinous. In 1846 Lindley estimated the known species leaves of a species of Acanthus, the A. spinosa, which is found in Greece. The acanthus first copied is supposed to have been growing around a flower-pot; and the merit of adopting the suggestion thus afforded for the ornamentation of the capital of a pillar is attributed to Callimachus. Another species, the A. mollis, grows in Italy, Spain,

"... has proceeded, during the nineteenth, with accelerated velocity."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

Nat. Phil.: Accelerated motion is that of which the velocity is continually becoming greater and greater. If the increase of speed is equal in equal times, it is called uniformly accelerated motion; but if unequal, then it is denominated variably accelerated motion. The fall of a stone to the ground is an example of uniformly accelerated motion.

1. As a participle:
"... the gravity of the accelerating force ceases to act."—Gregory: Haily's Nat. Phil., p. 51.

Mech.: The accelerating force is the force which produces accelerated motion. In the fall of a stone to the ground it is the gravitating power of the earth. It is the quotient produced by dividing the motion or absolute force by the weight of the body moved.

2. As substantive: Hastening.
"... and, it may be, in the spring, the accelerating would have been the speedier."—Lord Bacon: Works (1765), vol. 1.

III. The amount of the quickening, hastening, or development.

1. Natural Philosophy:
The rate of increase of velocity per unit of time. The C.G.S. unit of acceleration is the acceleration of a body whose velocity increases in every second by the C.G.S. unit of velocity—viz., by a centimetre per second. (Everett: C.G.S. System of Units (1875), ch. iii., p. 211.)
The Unit of Acceleration: That acceleration with which a unit of velocity would be gained in a unit of time. (Everett.) It varies directly as the unit of length, and inversely as the square of the unit of time. The numerical value of a given acceleration varies inversely as the unit of length, and directly as the square of the unit of time. (Ibid., ch. i., pp. 2, 3.) "If T stands for time, then angular acceleration is  $\frac{1}{T^2}$ " (Ibid.) "If L stands for length, and T for time, then acceleration is  $\frac{L}{T^2}$ " (Ibid.)

2. Astronomy:
The secular acceleration of the moon's mean motion: An increase of about eleven seconds per century in the rapidity of the moon's mean motion. It was discovered by Halley and explained by Laplace.
Acceleration of the fixed stars: The measure of the time by which a fixed star daily gains on the sun on passing the meridian. A star passes the meridian 3 min. 55.9 sec. earlier each day; not that the star's motion is really accelerated—it is that the sun's progress is retarded, as in addition to his apparent diurnal motion through the heavens, he is also making way to the east at the rate of 59 min. 8.2 sec. a day.

Acceleration of a planet: The increased velocity with which it advances from the perigee to the apogees of its orbit.

3. Hydrology:
Acceleration of the tides: The amount by which from certain causes high or low water occurs before its calculated time.

4. Phys. & Path.: The extent to which in certain circumstances the circulating fluid and other parts of the system gain increased activity.

āc-ĉĕl-ĕr-āt-ive, a. [ACCELERATE.] Producing increased velocity, quickening motion.

"If the force vary from instant to instant, its accelerative effect will also vary."—Atkinson: Ganot's Physics (1868), p. 13.

Accelerative force. [ACCELERATING.]

āc-ĉĕl-ĕr-āt-ōr, s. [ACCELERATE.] That which accelerates; a post-office van used to convey officials from place to place.

1. Anat.: A muscle, the contraction of which accelerates the expulsion of the urine.

2. Ord.: A cannon with several powder chambers, whose charges are exploded consecutively, in order to give a constantly increasing rate of progression to the projectiles as it passes along the bore.

āc-ĉĕnt, s. [In Ger. & Fr. accent; Ital. accento, fr. Lat. accentus = (1) the accentuation of a word, a tone, (2) the tone of a flute, (3) growth: ad = to; canus = tone, melody, or singing; cano = to sing; root can; Sansc. kan = to shins; Welsh can = bright, a song; canu = to bleach; Cornish kana = to whiten; Irish canaim = to sing.] [ACCEND.]

* I. Primarily, it signified the same as the Greek προσῳδία (prosōdia), viz., a musical intonation used by the Greeks in reading and speaking.

II. Now (in general language):

1. The laying of particular stress upon a certain syllable or certain syllables in a word; or an inflection of the voice which gives to each syllable of a word its due pitch with respect to height or lowness. In a dissyllable there is but one accent, as a-back, but in a polysyllable there are more than one. In transubstantiation there are properly three—tran-sub-stan-ti-a-tion. One of these, however—that on the fifth syllable, the a just before -tion—is greater than the rest, and is called the primary accent; the others are called secondary. There is a certain analogy between accent and emphasis, emphasis doing for whole words or clauses of sentences what accent does for single syllables.

2. Certain diacritical marks borrowed from the Greeks, and designed to regulate the force of the voice in pronunciation or for other uses. They are three in number: the acute accent (´), designed to note that the voice should be raised; the grave accent (`), that it should be depressed; and the circumflex (˘ or ˆ), which properly combines the characters of the two accents already named, that the voice should be first raised and then depressed. The acute and grave accents are much used in French, but to discriminate sounds, as élite, crème; and the circumflex of the form ˆ is frequently employed in Latin to discriminate the ablative of the first declension, as pennæ, from the nominative penna.

¶ Accents and other diacritical marks occur also in English. Sometimes the former are employed to regulate the stress of the voice; sometimes, again, they are employed for other purposes.

Specialty:

(a) Geom. & Alg.: Letters, whether capital or small, are at times accented, particularly when there is a certain relation between the magnitudes or quantities which they represent. Thus, for example, the lines A B may be compared with the line a' b', and the quantity x y with x' y'.

(b) Trig.: Accents mark minutes and seconds of a degree: e.g., 30° 16' 37".

(c) Hor.: Accents are sometimes used to denote minutes and seconds of an hour: e.g., 6h. 7' 14".

(d) Engineering: Feet and inches, and similar measures of length, are often noted by accents: thus, 3' 10" = 3 feet 10 inches.

3. Modes of speaking or pronunciation, with especial reference to dialectic peculiarities.

"The broadest accent of his province."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. lii.

¶ Poetry: Sometimes used for the language of a nation or race.

"How many ages hence
Shall this our lofty scene be acted o'er
In states unborn and accents yet unknown."
—Shakespeare: Jul. Cæsar, lii. l.

4. Sometimes without reference to dialectic peculiarities.

"Accent is a kind of chanting; all men have accent of their own, though they only notice that of others."
—Carlyle: Heroes and Hero-Worship, Lect. lii.

5. In the plural: Words. Chiefly in poetry, but also in prose.

"But when he speaks, what elocution flows!
Soft as the breeze of descending snows,
The copious accents fall, with easy art,
Melting they fall, and sink into the heart!"
—Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. iii. 283—286.

"... the last accents of the darling of the people."
—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

¶ In Poetry: Sometimes specially a vocal accompaniment to instrumental music.

"Not by chords alone Well touch'd, but by resistless accents more."
—Cooper: Transit of Milton's Lat. Poem to his Father.

6. Mod. Music: The strain which recurs at regular intervals of time. Its position is indicated by upright strokes called bars. The first note inside a bar is always accented. When the bars contain more than one group of notes, which happens in compound time, other accents of lesser force occur on the first note of each group: these are called secondary or subordinate accents, whilst that just inside the bar is termed the primary or principal accent. Other accents can be produced at any point by the use of the sign ˘ or ˆ. The throwing of the accent on a normally unaccented portion of the bar is called syncopation. A proper grouping of accents will produce a rhythm. It is considered a fault if an accented musical note falls on a short syllable. (Stainer and Barrett: Dictionary of Musical Terms.)

ác-çes-sör-y, s. [In Fr. accessoire; Low Lat. accessorius, fr. classical Lat. accessus.] [ACCESS.]

A. Of persons:

Law: One who is not the chief actor in an offence nor present at its commission, but still is connected with it in some other way. Accessories may become so before the fact or after the fact. Sir Matthew Hale defines an accessory before the fact as one who, being absent at the time of the crime committed, doth yet procure, counsel, or command another to commit a crime. If the procurer be present when the evil deed is being done, he is not an accessory, but a principal. An accessory after the fact is one who, knowing a felony to have been committed, receives, relieves, comforts, and assists the felon. In high treason of a pronounced character there are no accessories, all are principals. In petit treason, murder, and felonies, there may be accessories; except only in those offences which, by judgment of law, are sudden and unpremeditated, as manslaughter and the like, which, therefore, cannot have any accessories before the fact. So too in petit larceny, and in all crimes under the degree of felony, there are no accessories either before or after the fact; but all persons concerned therein, if guilty at all, are principals. (Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. iv., chap. iii.)

"For the law of principal and accessory, as respects high treason, there was, and is to this day, in a state of disgraceful to English jurisprudence. In cases of felony, a distinction, founded on justice and reason, is made between the principal and the accessory after the fact. He who conceals from justice one whom he knows to be a murderer is liable to punishment, but not to the punishment of murder. He, on the other hand, who shelters one whom he knows to be a traitor is, according to all our jurists, guilty of high treason."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

2. Ord. Lang. (somewhat figuratively): One who abets or countenances anything which is wrong, whether human law consider it a crime or no.

"An accessory by thine inclination
To all sins past, and all that are to come,
From the creation to the general doom."
Shaksp.: Haps of Lucrece.

B. Of things:

1. Gen.: That which helps something else.
"... the consideration constitutes an accessory to the fundamental law of progress."—Martineau: Comto's Philosophy, introd., ch. I.

2. Painting: Accessories are whatever representations are introduced into a painting apart from the leading figures. In literary composition, &c., the word has an analogous meaning.
"... who seeks only to embody in language the substance of the fact, and who discards all accessories, all ornament, and all conjecture."—Lewis: Credibility of Early Roman Hist.

3. Biol.: Something added to the usual number of organs or their parts. (Loudon)

"The swim-bladder has also been worked in as an accessory to the auditory organs of certain fish."—Darwin: Origin of Species.

ác-çes-sör-y, ác-çes-sar-y, a. [In Fr. accessoire.]

I. Of persons: Acceding to, contributing or contributory to, partially responsible for.
"... he would rather suffer with them than be accessory to their sufferings."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

"In the earlier editions of Macaulay the spelling adopted is accessory, in the later ones accessory."

II. Of things: Contributing, aiding in a secondary way.

I. Generally:
"... imply a whole train of accessory and explanatory local legends."—Grote: Hist. of Greece.

2. Anat. Accessory nerves (accessorius Will. Halli, or par accessorium): A pair of nerves which pursue a very devious course in the bodily frame. Arising by several filaments from the medulla spinalis of the neck, they advance to the first vertebra, and thence through the foramen of the os occipitis to the cranium. After communicating there with the ninth and tenth pairs they pass out close to the eighth, and terminate finally in the trapezius.

"The eighth pair [of nerves, according to Willan's arrangement] including the glosso-pharyngeal, the pneumo-gastric, and the spinal accessory."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. II., ch. xl.

3. Zool. Accessory cusps (in teeth): Those apperadded to the more normal ones, and contributing to their efficiency.
"The tooth of the fossil in question differs in the shape of the middle and in the size of the accessory cusps."—Owen: British Fossil Mammals (1846), p. 72.

Accessory valves (in the shells of the mollusca genera Pholax, Pholidida, and Xylophaga): Small valves additional to the two large ones naturally occurring in those "bi-valve" shells. They protect their dorsal margins. They are well seen in the common Pholax dactylus.

4. Painting: Pertaining to the mesential parts of a picture, introduced either for the purpose of illustrating the main subject, or for ornament's sake.

5. Scots Law:
(a) Accessory actions are those which are subservient to others, or designed to prepare the way for them: as, for instance, an action for the recovery of lost deeds.
(b) An accessory obligation is an obligation arising from another one which is antecedent and primary to it. Thus when one borrows money at interest, the repayment of the principal is the primary, and the regular liquidation of the interest the accessory obligation.

ác-çes-sus. [Lat. accessus.] A term in canon law, signifying a method of voting at the election of a pope, generally known as an election by acclamation.

"My husband says, my son profits nothing in the world at his book; I pray you, ask him some questions in his accidence."—Shaksp.: Merry Wives, IV, I.

ác-çi-dens, s. [Lat. accidens, pr. par. of accido; also s.] The opposite of essence or substance. [ACCIDENT, No. II.]

"Accidens, on the contrary, has no connexion whatever with the essence, but may come and go, and its species still remain what it was before."—J. S. Mill: Logic.

ác-çi-dent, s. [In Fr. accident; Ital. accidente; Lat. accidens, pr. par. of accido = to fall to, to arrive suddenly, to happen: ad = to; cedo = to fall.] [CASE, CADENCE.]

I. Of occurrences:
1. Gen.: An occurrence or event of whatever kind.
"And ye choose spirits, that admonish me,
And give me signs of future accidents!"
Shaksp.: King Henry VI., Part I., v, 8.

2. Specially:
(a) Something unperposed or unintentional, an occurrence not planned beforehand by man.
"Ant.
Or thy precedent services are all
But accidents unperposed."
Shaksp.: Antony and Cleopatra, IV, 12.
"And more by accident than choice,
I listened to that single voice."
Longfellow: Golden Legend, IV.

(b) An unforeseen occurrence, particularly if it be of a calamitous character. This is the most common use of the word.
"An unhappy accident, he told them, had forced him to make to them in writing a communication which he would gladly have made from the throne."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

"The old ones seem generally to die from accidents, as from falling down precipices."—Darwin: Voyage around the World.

(c) The state of a betrayed girl.

II. Of essentials:
1. Logic:
(a) Whatever does not really constitute an essential part of a person or thing; as the clothes one wears, the saddle on a horse, &c.

böü, böy; pöüt, jöwl; eat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, çenophon, exist. -inç-
-cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün. -tion, -çion = zün. -tious, -çious, -sious = şüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bçl, dçl

(b) The qualities or attributes of a person or thing, as opposed to the substance. Thus bitterness, hardness, &c., are attributes, and not part of the substance in which they inhere.

(c) That which may be absent from anything, leaving its essence still unimpaired. Thus a rose might be white without its ceasing to be a rose, because colour in the flowers of that genus is not essential to their character.

¶ Accidents, in Logic, are of two kinds—separable and inseparable. If walking be the accident of a particular man, it is a separable one, for he would not cease to be that man though he stood still; while on the contrary, if Spanish is the accident connected with him, it is an inseparable one, since he never can cease to be, ethnologically considered, what he was born. (Whately: Logic, bk. ii., chap. v., § 4.)

¶ From logic these significations have found their way into ordinary English literature.

"And torne substances into accident."

Chaucer: Pardoner's Tale, 13, 954.

"The accident of his birth . . . had placed him in a post for which he was altogether unfitted."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

2. Gram.: A property attached to a word which nevertheless does not enter into its essential definition. Each species of word has its accidents: thus those of the noun substantive are gender, declension, and number. Comparison in an adjective is also an accident.

"Unto grammar also belongeth, as an appendix, the consideration of the accidents of words, which are measure, sound, and elevation or accent, and the sweetness and harshness of them."—Bacon: Advanc. of Learning, bk. ii.

3. Her.: An additional note or mark on a coat of armour, which may be omitted or retained without altering its essential character.

† Med.: A symptom of a disease. (Rider.)

acc-ident-al, a. [Fr. accidental.]

1. Occurring suddenly, unexpectedly, and from a cause not immediately discoverable, or, as some of the unphilosophic and irreligious believe, "by chance."

"So shall you hear
Of accidental judgments, casual slaughters."
Shakspeare: Hamlet, v. 2.

* 2. Adventitious: produced not from the natural qualities of the agent or agency left to itself, but by the influence of something foreign to it.

"By such a minister as wind to fire,
His natural fury."—Denham: Sophy.

3. Not essential to, which might be dispensed with, and yet leave the thing to which it pertains, or in which it inheres, unimpaired.

"He determined that all the species occurring in this part, twelve in number, agreed in every respect, even in their accidental variations, with the same species now existing in Yorkshire."—Owen: British Fossil Mam. & Birds, p. 168.

¶ Specialty:

(a) In Logic, an accidental definition is one which assigns the properties of a species or the "accidents" of an individual. Besides accidental, there are also physical and logical definitions. (Whately: Logic.)

(b) Perp.: An accidental point is the point in which a straight line drawn from the eye parallel to another given straight line intersects the plane of the picture. Thus, in the accompanying figure, A B is the line parallel to C D, the line given in perspective. A B cuts the plane B F in the point B. B is the accidental point.

(c) Music: Accidental is the term used respecting such sharps, flats, and naturals as do not occur at the clef, and which imply a change of key, or modulation different from that in which the piece began. For instance, in the key of C natural major, an accidental sharp prefixed to F implies the key of G major, and a flat placed before B implies the key of F major or D minor.

(d) Optics: Accidental colours, called also ocular spectra, are those which are produced by a weakness in the eye, and which are not essential to the light itself. If a person look intently with one eye at a coloured wafer affixed to a sheet of white paper, and then turn that same eye on another part of the paper, a spot like the wafer will appear, but of a different colour. If the wafer was red, the spot will be green; if the former was black, the latter will be white; and there will be corresponding transformations whatever the colour.

acc-ident-al, s. [From the adjective.]

1. Logic and Ord. Lang.: A property which is not essential; that is, one which may be dispensed with without greatly altering the character of that of which it is a property.

¶ Often in the plural.

"Conceive as much as you can of the essentials of any subject before you consider its accidents."—Watts: Logic.

"This similitude consisteth partly in essentials, or the likeness of nature; partly in accidentals, or the likeness in figure or affections."—Pearson: The Creed, Art. 1.

2. Painting (plural): Those fortuitous effects produced by light falling upon particular objects, so that portions of them stand forth in abnormal brightness, and other portions are cast into the shadow and greatly darkened.

3. Music (sing.): A sharp or flat prefixed to certain notes in a movement. [See the adjective.]

acc-ident-al-ly, adv. [From accidental, adj.] The quality of being accidental.

" . . . to take from history its accidental, and from science its fatalism."—Coleridge: Table Talk.

acc-ident-al-ly, adv. [From accidental, adj.]

Riley, editor of the Mountaine Gildhall Londonensis, says, in his preface, p. xviii., that in the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth centuries the more educated classes used the French word achat, probably pronounced by the English achat, to designate buying or selling at a profit. This "achat" was the source of Whittington's wealth. When the term had gone into disuse, and its meaning had become forgotten, some inventive genius, not understanding it, devised the story of Whittington and his Cat. 1. Achromatic Telescope: The name given by Dr. Bevis to an improved form of the refracting telescopes constructed by Dollond in 1761. When a single lens is used for the object-glass of a telescope, the image of the object is fringed with colour, and hence high magnifying powers cannot be used, unless the focal length of the lens is very considerable. Sir Isaac Newton, from experiments made on the refrangibility of light, had erroneously concluded that the size of the object-glasses of refracting telescopes could not be enlarged beyond three or four inches [APERTURE]: for this reason he turned his attention to reflected light, in which the image of the object is uncoloured. Reflecting telescopes of the Gregorian form were from Newton's time generally used. In the middle of the last century, Dollond, a Spitalfields weaver, undertook a course of experiments with the object of ascertaining the correctness of Newton's statements. His researches were rewarded by the valuable discovery that by using two different kinds of glass, and giving to the surfaces of each lens a different curvature—the focal lengths of the two lenses being in a certain ratio—an image of the object could be obtained free from colour; while, by a skillful arrangement of the radii of the surfaces of each glass, the errors arising from spherical aberration [ABERRATION] could be entirely removed. In the early telescopes made by Dollond and his son Peter, the object-glass was usually a double concave lens of flint enclosed between two convex glasses of crown (Fig. 1); but modern object-glasses have only a concave lens of flint combined with a convex of crown or plate (Fig. 2). A century ago flint-glass of a size suitable for large telescopes could not be obtained; but more recently the removal of the excise duty, and the success attained by Guinand and others in glass manufacture, have enabled English and foreign opticians to construct achromatic telescopes of considerable magnitude, with object-glasses of twelve, fifteen, and even twenty-six inches diameter, the area of aperture having the property of increasing in a considerable ratio the power of the telescope to penetrate into space and render visible the minutest objects. Achromatic telescopes, from their convenient size and comparative cheapness, have been and still are generally used by astronomers in Great Britain, Europe, and America, and by their aid many modern discoveries have been made. So perfect is the image formed by a well-corrected achromatic object-glass, that almost any magnifying power can be applied; and thus a telescope of this form three or four feet in length is superior in its definition and surpasses in magnifying power one of the old unwieldy telescopes 100 feet long. The eye-glasses of the telescope also require to be free from colour and aberration, and the correction of these defects is accomplished by an arrangement of the lenses forming the eye-piece. [See EYE-PIECE, OBJECT-GLASS, APLANATIC.]

2. Achromatic Microscope: In a compound microscope an image of the object is first formed by the objective, and afterwards enlarged by the lenses constituting the eye-piece. Till about the year 1830 the object-glasses of microscopes were mostly formed of single or combined lenses, the apertures of which, in order to obtain a distinct image of the object, were exceedingly small. The labours of modern opticians to adapt the achromatic principle to compound microscopes were rewarded by the construction of lenses in which the images of objects were rendered distinct in their minute details even when high magnifying powers were applied. In a modern microscopic objective, not only is the colour corrected and the image free from distortion, but by an increase in the angle of aperture [ANGLE OF APERTURE] the penetrating power of the objective is considerably increased, and less magnifying power is required from the eye-piece. With a good objective of one-eighth of an inch focus, magnifying powers ranging from 450 to 1,200 diameters can be obtained by using different eye-pieces. [OBJECTIVE.]

II. As substantive:

I. Chem.: A salt of hydrogen in which the hydrogen can be replaced by a metal, or can, with a basic metallic oxide, form a salt of that metal and water. Acid oxides of the same element are distinguished by the termination of -ous and -ic—as sulphurous and sulphuric—the latter containing the most oxygen; they are also called anhydrides. They unite with water and form acids having the same terminations. By replacement of the hydrogen by a metal they form salts distinguished by the terminations -ite and -ate respectively. These acids are called oxygen acids; formerly it was thought that all acids contained oxygen, this element being regarded as the acidifying principle (generating acid). But many acids are formed by direct union of hydrogen with an element, as hydrochloric acid (HCl), hydrosulphuric acid (H<sub>2</sub>S), or with an organic radical, as hydrocyanic acid, H(CN). Acids which are soluble in water reddens blue litmus, and have a sour taste. Acids are said to be monobasic, dibasic, tribasic, &c., according as one, two, or three atoms of hydrogen can be replaced by a metal. Organic acids can be produced by the oxidation of an alcohol or aldehyde. They contain the monad radical (HO·OC), once if they are monobasic, twice if dibasic, &c. They are also classified as monatomic, diatomic, &c., according as they are derived from a monatomic or diatomic alcohol, &c. Acids derived from a diatomic alcohol can be alcohol acids or aldehyde acids. [See GLYCOL.] Many organic acids occur in the juices of vegetables, some in animals, as formic acid in ants.

2. Min.: In W. Phillips' arrangement of minerals, acids constitute his third class. He arranges under it sulphuric acid and boric acid, both of which occur native.

Under the fourth class above-named were ranked such minerals as calc spar, gypsum, boracite, witherite, heavy spar, strontianite, &c.; under his fifth class were ranked nitre,atron, borax, sal-ammoniac, &c.; and under his sixth, slum, cryolite, and glauuberite. Minerals are now arranged on another principle. [MINERALOGY.]

This may be done by volumetric or by weight analysis. The former method is carried out by ascertaining the measured quantity of a standard alkaline solution required to saturate a given volume of the acid. That by weight analysis can be effected in more ways than one. A convenient one is to decompose a known weight of the acid with an excess of acid carbonate of sodium or potassium, and estimate by weight the quantity of carbonic anhydride evolved. When this is done the quantity of real acid can without difficulty be ascertained. (Watts: Chemistry.)

1. A name of the common Blue Monk's-hood (Aconitum napellus). It occurs wild in Carinthia and Carniola, and, having long been cultivated in British gardens, has escaped and become naturalised in England. It is a very poisonous plant, the root being especially dangerous. When the leaves and flowers have died away, the root, or root-stock, has sometimes been mistaken for that of horseradish, and has been eaten with fatal results. The root is of tapering form, and when old is dark brown outside and white inside, whilst the young ones are much paler. Its taste is bitter at first, after which there is a numbness and tingling of the lips and tongue. The root-stock of the horse-radish (Cochlearia amaracea) is much larger than that of the aconite, and does not taper. Externally it is of a dirty yellow colour, and marked at the top by transverse scars, left behind by the leaves. Its taste is at first acrid or pungent, not bitter. [ACONITUM.]

2. Less properly (among some gardeners, and popularly): The Eranthis nivalis, a plant of the order Ranunculaceæ, the same one as that to which the proper aconite belongs.

a-cóus'-tics, or a-cóus'-tics, s. [In Fr. acoustique.] [ACOUSIC.] A term introduced by Saveur. The science which treats of sounds, or, more specifically, that branch of natural philosophy which treats of the nature of sound and the laws of its production and propagation, as far as these depend on physical principles. Sound is produced by the vibration of the particles in a sonorous body, evoked by a blow or in some other way. If a number of small light wooden balls be suspended by silk threads over a bell-jar, just in contact with the widest part of the glass, the drawing of a violin-bow across the edge of the glass will impart to the particles of the latter a vibratory movement, which will make itself visible by flinging off the balls oftener than once. Sound requires an elastic medium for its transmission to the tympanum of the ear. In vacuo it becomes inaudible, but brought in contact with air it is heard without difficulty. Its rate of progress through dry air, at a temperature of 32°, is, according to Vander Kolk, 1,091 feet 8 inches in a second; and according to Mr. Stone, 1,090-6 feet: through metallic rods its motion is much more rapid.

Two particles which are in the same state of vibration—i.e., are equally displaced from the positions which they occupied in equilibrium, and are moving in the same direction, and with equal velocities—are said to be in the same phase; whilst those which are proceeding in a contrary direction are said to be in opposite phases.

If the vibration of particles takes place in the same direction as that in which the disturbance is moving from particle to particle, it is called longitudinal; if at right angles to it, transverse.

So analogous are the sound-producing vibrations of particles to those of waves in the ocean, that the terms waves and undulations are used in Acoustics as well as in Hydrology. The distance which separates two particles in the same phase is called the length of a wave. As in Optics, so in Acoustics, there are refraction and reflection, the laws in both cases being the same.

Refraction of sound : The change of direction which is produced when a wave of sound, travelling through one medium, meets a second one not of the same kind, and excites in it a wave of a different velocity and direction from the first.

Reflection of sound : The change of direction which is produced when a wave of sound, travelling through one medium, meets a second one diverse from the first, and in addition to transmitting to it a refracted wave, excites in it an undulation travelling in a different direction, but with the same velocity as the other. A sound may be frequently repeated, as from an echo-producing cliff, and in a whispering gallery or a tunnel.

Two or more sonorous waves travelling through the same medium, and acting on the same particles, are said mutually to interfere with each other. If they move towards such an interference from exactly opposite directions, they produce between them a stationary wave. This expression does not imply that every particle of the wave thus produced is motionless. Some particles are so, whilst others vibrate longitudinally or transversely. The points at which the particles are stationary are called nodes, and the vibratory portions ventral segments. A vibrating musical string, a tuning-fork, or other stiff rod vibrating longitudinally, make stationary waves. These are generated also inside wind-instruments when the latter are blown. The vibrations of a solid are best communicated to another solid: hence a tuning-fork being struck is applied to a table, and violin-strings are placed in contact with a hollow wooden box, which imparts to their sound a greater intensity than if its transmission to the ear were entrusted to the air alone.

Noise is a single blow given to the ear, whilst Music is caused by a series of feeble blows following one another at regular intervals. [MUSIC, HARMONY, SOUND.]

Some writers have divided Acoustics into Diacoustics, which treats of those sounds which pass directly from the sonorous body to the ear; and Catacoustics, which investigates the phenomena of reflected sounds. Another division is into Acoustics proper, or the science of hearing, and Phonetics, or the science of sound; the latter word being from Gr. φωνή (phōnē) = sound.

This one contains, among other insects, the migratory locust, and some of the small "grasshoppers" so often heard and seen among grass, which are properly locusts. The family is, by various authors, called Locustidae, a term, however, which some apply to the grasshoppers proper. [LOCUSTIDÆ.]

1. Zoology:

A term introduced by Mr. Macleay, the founder of the now extinct circular or quinary school of zoologists, and used by him to designate those animals in which, as he believed, the nervous system was confusedly blended with the other tissues, or, in other words, that in which nervous molecules dispersed over, or, as it were, confounded with the substance of those gelatinous animals, impregnated their whole structure with sensibility. He included under the Acrita the following five classes:—(1) Polypi vaginatis; (2) Polypi natantes; (3) Intestina; (4) Agaricia, or Infusoria; and (5) Polypi rudes. These five classes he believed to constitute a circle.

2. In 1835 Professor Owen proposed to use the word in a more restricted sense for animals whose nervous system is obscure. His Acrita do not figure as a sub-kingdom of animals, but constitute a series of the Radiated sub-kingdom running parallel to another series, thus:

- NEMATONEURA. ACRITA.
- Class Radlaris (Lamarck).
- Echinodermata (Cuvier). Acalepha (Cuvier).
- Class Polypi (Cuvier).
- Ciliobrachata (Farré). Anthozoa (Ehrenb.).
- Nudibranchiata (Farré).
- Class Entozoa (Rudolph).
- Cœlmintha (Owen). Sterelmintha (Owen).
- Class Infusoria (Cuvier).

former was, of course, the more abstruse, and more rigorously established than the merely popular exoteric teaching. [ACROAMATIC.]

ἀκ-ρό-γ-ἔ-ν-οῦ-σ, a. [ACROGEN.]
Gen.: Growing at the top.
Spec.: Pertaining to the flowerless plants called Acrogens. When applied to fungi, it signifies = attached to the tips of threads.

ἀκ-ρό-γ-ἔ-ν-σ (Eng.), ἀκ-ρό-γ-ἔ-ν-σ (Latinised Greek), s. pl. [Gr. ἀκρον (akron) = a point or top, and γεννάω (gennao) = to engender, to bring forth; (lit.) top-growers or point-growers.] Plants of which the growth takes place at the extremity of the axis. The word was formerly used in a wider sense than now.

1. Formerly it included all flowerless plants—Linneus's Cryptogamia. The term, however, referred not to the absence of flowers, or to the obscure character of the fructification, but to the growth of the stem. All plants were divided into Acrogens, or those growing around the circumference of the trunk, just within the bark; Endogens, or those growing inside, that is, along the central axis; and Acrogens, or those increasing at the extremity of the stem. In Lindley's Natural System of Botany, 2nd edit. (1836), the Acrogens, used in this extensive sense, constitute the fifth class of the Vegetable Kingdom, the other four being Acrogens, Gymnosperms, Endogens, and Rhizantha. They are made to contain five alliances: 1, Filicales (Ferns); 2, Lycopodales (Club-mosses); 3, Muscales (Mosses); 4, Charales (Charas); and, 5, Fungales (Mushrooms, Lichens, and Algae).

2. The meaning is now more restricted. In Lindley's Vegetable Kingdom (1846) the flowerless plants compose not one, but two classes: (1) Thallogens and (2) Acrogens. The former are the lower in organisation. The latter compose three alliances—Muscales, Lycopodales, and Filicales. The arrangement, it will be observed, is now an ascending one, whereas before it was descending.

First recognized in 1866 by Dr. Marie, of Paris, who considered it a return to primitive form. Virchow, however, regarded it as a nervous disease, likely to result in paralysis and death. A case was noted by Dr. F. D. Weise, of New York, in January, 1896.

Its author was St. Luke (compare Luke i. 1-4 with Acts i. 1), who was Paul's companion from the time of his visit to Troas (Acts xvi. 8-11) to the advanced period of his life when he penned the 2nd Epistle to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 11). It contains the sea-anemones and coral polypes. It is to animals of this class that the erection of the vast coral reefs is owing. Most Actinozoa have a central mouth with tentacles around it. Their alimentary canal freely passes, by means of a wide aperture, into the general cavity of the body. That cavity is then prolonged into the stomach, which is internal, a character in which the Actinozoa differ from the Hydrozoa, to which they are closely allied.

Act-ion (Eng.), Act-ion (O. Scotch.), s. [In Ger. aktion (rhet.); Fr. action; Ital. azione; fr. Lat. actio = a doing, an action; fr. ago (lit.) = to set in motion, to drive, as cattle.]

I. The doing of a deed, the effecting of an operation.

(a) Of persons or other living beings capable of carrying out a purpose:

1. Ord. Lang.: The doing of a deed, as distinguished from thinking, feeling, speaking, or even writing.

"The men seem formed for action, the women for love."—Gibbon; Decl. & Fall, ch. xiii.

"One wise in council, one in action brave." Pope; Homers Iliad, bk. xviii., 298.

2. Spec.: Fighting, which, demanding the utmost energy, is deemed in the last degree worthy of being called action.

"The King gave orders . . . that the Guards should be held ready for action."—Macaulay; Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

3. Manège.: The movement of parts of the body; as, A horse has a fine action.

4. Technically:

(a) Mental Phil.: A volition carried into effect.

"Now, what is an action? Not one, but a series of two things: the state of mind called a volition, followed by an effect. The volition or intention to produce the effect is one thing; the effect produced in consequence of the intention is another thing; the two together constitute the action."—J. S. Mill; Logic, vol. I., ch. iii., § 5, pp. 71, 72.

(b) Ethics: The doing of a deed viewed as an expression of the moral sentiments or state of a responsible being.

(c) Oratory: The accommodation of a speaker's voice, attitude, and especially his gesture, to the subject on which at that moment he is addressing his audience.

"For I have neither wit, nor words, nor worth, Action, nor utterance, nor the power of speech, To stir men's blood: I only speak right on." Shakespeare; Julius Cæsar, III. 2.

"As 'twere encouraging the Greeks to fight; Making such sober action with his hand, That it beguiled attention, charm'd the sight." Shakespeare; Tarquin and Lucrece.

(b) Of things:

1. Gen.: The exertion of force or influence upon; operation, setting in motion, an acting upon.

"Some little effect may, perhaps, be attributed to the direct action of the external conditions of life."—Darwin; Origin of Species, ch. I.

2. Technically:

(a) Nat. Phil.: The exertion of a force by one material body upon another. It may be by contact or by percussion. In either case it is met by resistance precisely equal to that produced by itself, or, in philosophical language, action and re-action are equal and contrary; that is, they are equal in force and contrary in direction. If an elastic ball be struck against the ground, action compresses it, and reaction brings it back again to its natural shape. When birds fly, the action produced by the strokes of their wings produces a contrary reaction on the part of the air, and it is this reaction which carries them forward.

" . . . the frost ruptures their cohesion, and hands them over to the action of gravity."—Tyndall; Frag. of Science, 3rd ed., l. 24.

"Action and reaction being equal, and in contrary directions."—Herschel; Astronomy, 5th ed., § 723.

(b) Chem.: The production of a chemical reaction by the action of acid.

(c) Geol. (spec. of volcanoes): In action = in eruption.

"I was surprised at hearing afterwards that Acapulco, in Chile, 480 miles northwards, was in action on the same night."—Darwin; Journal of Voyage round the World, ch. xiv., p. 251.

(d) Art (of machines), &c.: Operation, movement, or anything similar produced by external agency of whatever kind (lit. & fig.).

"At length the new machinery was put in action, and soon from every corner of the realm arrived the news of complete and hopeless failure."—Macaulay; Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

(e) Law: In action. [See No. II., 4, d.]

(f) Mach., &c.: The mechanism of a piano, organ, &c.; the movement or works of a watch or clock.

II. A deed done, an operation effected.

1. Gen.: A deed, something done.

"There is a shade of difference in meaning between an action in this sense and an act. Strictly speaking, action is the general word used of deeds, whether important or the reverse; whilst act is more appropriately applied to a deed of some importance. The examples which follow illustrate the difference, which, however, is not universally observed.

"The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed."—1 Sam. II. 2.

"He made known His ways unto Moses, His acts unto the children of Israel."—Ps. ciii. 7.

"And she said to the King, It was a true report which I heard in mine own land of thine acts, and of thy wisdom."—2 Chron. ix. 5.

"Here perhaps Some advantageous act may be achieved By sudden onset." Milton; P. L., II. 383.

2. Spec.: A battle.

"All this William perfectly understood, and determined to avoid an action as long as possible."—Macaulay; Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

3. Old Scotch.: A affair, business, interest.

"'Tis as far as pertains to our actions, consider that our enemies are to fight against us, whom we never offend with injuries."—Bellend.; Crom., bk. IV., ch. 17.

4. Technically:

(c) Phys.: The functions of the body, divided into vital actions, natural actions, and animal actions. [FUNCTIONS.]

(b) Painting & Sculpture: Passion or movement more or less correctly limited. The more life-like and spirited the figures represented appear to be, the more action are they said to possess.

(c) Epic Poetry, the Drama, or History: The leading subject of an epic poem, drama, or history. In the former two it is divided into two portions—the principal fable treated in a lofty style, and the episodes which are introduced to give fulness of detail, the whole being carried on by a mixture of narrative, dialogue, and soliloquy. So also there are a leading theme and episodes in history.

"The voyage of Æneas from Troy to Italy, and his establishment in Latium (constituting, as they do, the main action of the Æneid)."—Lewis; Credibility of Early Roman Hist., ch. ix.

"But these resting-places, as it were, must be rare, exceptional, brief, and altogether subordinate to what may be called the action, the unfolding of the drama of events."—Mittman; Hist. of Jews. (Prel.)

(d) Law:

(l) Eng. Law: The form prescribed by law for the recovery of one's due, or the lawful demand of one's right. Actions are divided into civil and criminal; the former are called also processions, and are divided into three classes—(1) Personal Actions, by which a man claims a debt or personal duty to him, or damages in lieu of it. These again are subdivided into Actions ex contractu, as for debt, promises, covenant, &c., and Actions ex delicto, or torts, as negligences, trespass, and nuisance. (2) Real or Feodal Actions, concerning real property only, in which the plaintiff, called in this relation the demandant, claims a title to lands, tenements, or rents. (3) Mixed Actions, partaking of the character of both; as, for example, when some real property is demanded, and, in addition to this, personal damages for a wrong sustained, such, for instance, as ejectionment. There are many kinds of actions ranked under these three classes. Criminal Actions consist of prosecutions and actions penal to recover some penalty under statute.

"Actions were brought against persons who had defamed the Duke of York."—Macaulay; Hist. Eng., ch. II.

"In action. A plea in action is an answering the merits of a complaint; that is, by confirming or denying it. Property in action is property which a man has not at present in his possession, but which another has covenanted to give him. He may sue for the performance of the contract, and the property thus recoverable is called, from the French word chose = a thing, a chose in action.

Chose in action is thus a thing of which a man has not the possession or actual enjoyment, but which he has a right to demand by action or other proceeding, as a debt, a bond, &c. A chose in action must be reduced into possession by a trustee without delay.

(ii) Scots Law: Actions are sometimes divided into ordinary and recisorry. [RECISORY.]

(c) Comm. (in France and some other foreign countries): A certain share of a public company's capital stock. Persons may subscribe for actions in the latter as they do here for shares.

A. As adjective:

Essential signification: Possessed of the power of acting; communicating action or motion to anything else, instead of being itself acted on.

"Used properly of the mind or spirit of a living being. "It is usual to speak of physical causes as active; but when any series of natural changes is scrutinised, it appears that what at first we called a cause, is itself the effect of some preceding event, which was, in its turn, an effect. . . . Strictly speaking, mind is the only active principle." (Isaac Taylor; Elements of Thought.)

I. Ordinary Language:

(a) Of animated beings:

1. Acting, as opposed to being acted upon. [See example from Donne (B. I.)]

In this classification there are two other descriptions of verbs—passive and neuter verbs, the former expressing passion, or suffering, or the receiving of an action; and the latter, denoting neither action nor passion, but being, or a state of being. (Lindley Murray: Grammar.) A verb active is now generally called a transitive verb, in this Dictionary marked v.t.

A compound active verb (Dr. Campbell): an active transitive verb (Crombie): One which, when standing alone, is neuter and intransitive, but which being followed by a preposition inseparably connected with it, forms with it a compound verb, which is active or transitive. Example: To laugh at. Omit at, and the verb is neuter, or intransitive, as "He laughed." Insert it, however, and a compound active verb is formed, as "He laughed at them," "they were laughed at." 2. Law. Actual as opposed to apparent right of possession of property is one which will stand the test against all comers. It has a fantastic look, its stem being of little height, but of great thickness; one specimen was found thirty feet in diameter. The fruit is about ten inches long. Externally it is downy; within this down is a hard woody rind, which requires a saw to cut it across; and inside the rind is an eatable pulp, of slightly acid taste. The juice mixed with sugar is serviceable in putrid and pestilential fevers. The Africans mix the dried and powdered leaves with their food to promote perspiration, and Europeans have found them useful in diarrhoea and dysentery. The Adansonia is properly a native of Africa, but it has been introduced, probably by the Mussulmans, into India, where its large white flowers appear in May and June, to be in due time followed by fruit.

triangular head and a short tail. It rarely exceeds two feet in length. It is the only poisonous reptile in Britain. The common snake (Coluber natrix), which is sometimes confounded with it, may be distinguished by having a longer tail, and what looks like a yellowish-white collar around its neck. ADDER'S TONGUE (OPHIOGLOSSUM VULGATUM).

1. Complete plant. 2. Fructification. 3. Portion of No. 2 magnified. 4. Spores.

reference is to the fact that the fructification is not, as is usual with ferns, on the back of the frond, but is in a lengthened spike, remotely resembling a serpent's tongue. One species occurs in England, the common adder's tongue (Ophioglossum vulgatum).

"A man grows indeed, sottish, and addicted to low company and low merriment."—Maccusius: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

‡ It is not creditable to human nature that the bad sense of the word now is the most common one, as if one more frequently gave himself over to an evil pursuit or practice than to a good one, and the devotion in the former case was, as a rule, greater than in the latter.

B. Technically. Old Roman Law: Various meanings, among others, to assign a debtor to the service of his creditor as a means of liquidating his debt. The principal of the debt, as contradistinguished from the interest accruing on it, was called addictus. Ch. Hist.: Pertaining to things indifferent, or looked upon as not worth disputing about. The term was introduced to designate an ecclesiastical controversy which broke out in the year 1548. The Emperor Charles V. having issued a paper, popularly called the Interim, in which he prescribed what faith and practice the Protestants were to adopt till the Council of Trent should dictate a permanent form of belief and worship, Maurice, Elector of Saxony, urged Melancthon and his friends to decide what portions of the document they would accept and follow. Melancthon, whose temperament was timid, and whose spirit was eminently conciliatory, proposed to go very far in the direction prescribed. Regarding many doctrines and practices in disputa between the antagonistic churches of Roma and Wittenberg as adiaphoristic—that is, as pertaining to matters indifferent—he considered that, for the sake of peace and harmony, the Emperor might be permitted to have his own way with regard to them, and that, to a very large extent, the Interim might be accepted and obeyed. Luther had died two years previously, but his followers, being specially irritated to find the doctrine of justification by faith figuring among the things adiaphoristic, refused to join in the great concessions proposed. A controversy in consequence arose between the followers of Luther and those of Melancthon. It was called the adiaphoristic controversy, and embraced two questions: (1) What things were indifferent; and (2) whether, with regard to things indifferent, the emperor could or could not, in concinnce, be obeyed. "It was said of him that he was competent to fill any place on shipboard from that of carpenter up to that of admiral."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

¶ There are various gradations in rank among admirals. The chief distinction is into admirals, vice-admirals, and rear-admirals. Among the former stand pre-eminent the "admirals of the fleet," of whom at present there are three. This distinction gives no additional command, but only additional pay. In each of the three grades of admirals there were till of late years three sub-divisions, named from the colour of their flags, the Red, the White, and the Blue: now they are styled respectively, admiral, vice-admiral, and rear-admiral. The flags of admirals, strictly so called, are displayed at the main-top-gallant mast-head; those of vice-admirals at the fore-top-gallant mast-head; and those of rear-admirals at the mizen-top-gallant mast-head. All are called flag-officers. The admiral and commander-in-chief of the fleet ranks with a field-marshal in the army; admirals with flags at the main-top, with generals; vice-admirals with lieutenant-generals; and rear-admirals with major-generals.

B. Of ships: A ship which carries an admiral; a flag-ship; the most considerable ship of any fleet, whether of merchantmen or fishing-vessels, hence, any large and fine ship.

The caterpillar, which is spiny, in colour black, and with a range of saffron lines on each side, feeds on the nettle, the leaves of which it forms into a sheath fastened with silk. It is found in Great Britain. [VANESSA.]

2. The White Admiral: A butterfly—the Li-

menitis cybilla. It is dull black above, variegated with obscure dark spots. Both pairs of wings are traversed by a broad oblique white band, which on the upper pair is much interrupted. Each of these has also four white spots on it, whilst the lower pair of wings has numerous dark ones. The prevailing colour beneath is brownish yellow, with the base of the hinder wings and the under-side of the body pale blue. The expansion of the wings is nearly two inches. The caterpillar, which is green, with the head, dorsal appendages, and sides of the belly reddish, feeds on the honeysuckle. The White Admiral is found in the south of England, but is rare.

At present (1877) there are a First Lord of the Admiralty with a seat in the cabinet, a senior, a second, and a junior naval lord, and a civil lord, assisted by several secretaries. There are eleven departments in the Admiralty.

"There have certainly been abuses at the Admiralty which I am unable to defend."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

The High Court of Admiralty is a court, the judge in which was originally a mere deputy of the Lord High Admiral, but is now appointed by the Crown. It is divided into a prize and an instance court; the first takes cognizance of cases arising out of the capture of vessels as prizes in time of war at sea, and the last of assaults and batteries occurring on the high seas, collisions between ships, piratical seizure of vessels, officers' and seamen's wages, &c. Formerly it had cognizance of all crimes occurring on the high seas or in large tidal waters beneath that part of their course spanned by bridges, but these are now transferred to the ordinary judges. Ireland has a court of admiralty; Scotland has none. There are vice-admiralty courts in many of the colonies; from these an appeal lies to the Sovereign in Council.

In the year now mentioned, Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone having introduced a Reform Bill embodying proposals for a considerable enlargement of the franchise, some of the more moderate Liberals declined to support it, and took counsel together how to prevent its passing into law. On this Mr. Bright, who was warmly in its favour, compared the new party to the discontented persons who repaired to King David when he was in the Cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2). The name took effect, and those to whom it was applied became, for the time, universally known as the Adullamites. A more sweeping Reform Bill than that proposed in 1866 having been carried under a Conservative Government a year later, the Adullamite party, which contained men widely differing on many points, ceased to act together, and gravitated some to the one and others to the other side of the House.

a-dül-tör-ä-tíon, s. [In Ital. adulterazione, fr. Lat. adulteratio; adultero = (1) to defile, (2) to falsify, to adulterate.]

I. The act of adulterating.

II. The state of being adulterated.

III. The thing which mixed with another debases its value.

Specially:

I. Of different kinds of food, or any other articles possessed of marketable value: "The act of debasing a pure or genuine article for pecuniary profit, by adding to it an inferior or spurious article, or taking one of its constituents away." Another definition which has been given is, "The act of adding intentionally to an article, for purposes of gain, any substance or substances the presence of which is not acknowledged in the name under which the article is sold."

The practice of adulteration must, more or less, have prevailed in every country, and in all but the most primitive ages. In England, as early as the thirteenth century, the legislature attempted, though with but partial success, to strike a blow against it, in the Act 51 Henry III., stat. 6, often quoted as the "Pillory and Tumbrel Act." The methods of debasing saleable articles which were adopted in those early times were few and simple; it was not till a comparatively recent period that the more ingenious forms of adulteration began to prevail. Once having taken root, however, they soon flourished greatly. Between 1851 and 1854, and even on to 1857, a sanitary commission on the adulteration of food, instituted in connection with the Lancet newspaper, and most ably conducted by Dr. Arthur Hill Hassall, made revelations of so startling a character that parliamentary action took place on the subject. The first legislative measure which followed—that of 1860—was a complete failure, the act being inefficient and useless. A stronger enactment was consequently passed in 1872. It was entitled "An Act to Amend the Law for the Adulteration of Food, Drink, and Drugs." Under this Act many prosecutions and convictions took place; but owing to the seller being entirely in the hands of the analyst, there being no appeal from his certificate, a feeling of dissatisfaction and distrust arose in the minds of manufacturers and traders, and another act was demanded. This, which came into force in 1875, gave the right of appeal to the Laboratory, Somerset House, in cases in which the correctness of the local analyst's certificate was disputed. In 1869 an Act had been passed to restrain the adulteration of seeds.

The most notable kinds of adulteration are the following:—1st. The addition of a substance of inferior value for the sake of adding to the bulk and weight of one more precious, as the mixing of water with milk, fat with butter, or of chicory with coffee. 2nd. The addition of a substance with the view of heightening the colour and improving the appearance of an article, as well as to conceal other forms of adulteration. Examples: The colouring of pickles or preserves with salts of copper. 3rd. The addition of a substance designed to aid or increase the flavour or pungency of another. Example: The addition to vinegar of sulphuric acid. 4th. The addition of a substance designed to ensure that a larger quantity of another one shall be consumed. Example: Beer, one of the chief adulterants of which at present is salt, put into the liquor to ensure that when one employs it to slake his thirst, the more he drinks the more thirsty will he become. Some of the substances used for adulterating articles of food—the salts of copper and sulphuric acid for instance—are poisonous; but Mr. Harkness, F.C.S., of the Laboratory, Somerset House, who has had much experience in analysing specimens sent thither on appeal, considers that at present adulteration does not prevail so extensively as the public believe, and that, as a rule, the purchaser of a debased article is more likely to suffer in pursuance than in health.

A. Of persons:

I. Law & Ord. Lang.: An unlawful commerce among two married persons not standing to each other in the relation of husband and wife, or between a married person and another unmarried. In the former case it has been called double, and in the latter single adultery. Varied punishments, mostly of a very severe character, have in nearly all countries and ages been inflicted on those who have committed this great offence. In some cases it has been deemed lawful for a husband or the woman's father to kill the guilty person if taken in the act. By the law of England, the slaughter of the offending parties in such cases is deemed manslaughter of a not very aggravated sort. The spiritual courts give divorce a mensa et thoro, meaning from board and bed. The Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, created by 20 and 22 Vict., c. 85, grants it a vinculo matrimonii, from the bond of marriage, with damages often heavy against the "co-respondent."

Law: The right of presentation to a vacant benefice, which is called in Scotland patronage. [PATRONAGE.] This is of three kinds: (1) Presentation, when the patron has a right to present a clergyman to the bishop for institution; (2) collation, when the bishop is himself the patron of the living; and (3) donation, when the king or a subject, acting under the royal licence, founds a church or chapel on the footing that it shall be subject to his visitation only, and not be placed under the bishop, and that he (the patron) shall have the power of putting a clergyman in it without presentation, institution, or induction. Hence advowsons are classified as presentative, collative, and donative. The reason why they were generally vested in lords of the several manors was that it was in most cases their ancestors, or at least predecessors more or less remote, who originally built the church, or were "advocates" of ecclesiastical privileges. [ADVOCATE.] An advowson still attached to a manor is called an appendant. If, however, it be once sold to a purchaser it ceases in all future time to be appendant, and is said to be in gross, or at large. Advowsons, originally trusts, are now considered heritable property.

adze, v.t. To shape by means of an adze.

adzed, pa. par. [ADZE, v.]

adz-ing, pr. par. [ADZE, v.]

æ (pron. generally ð, and occasionally ð; when it has the latter sound, it is marked in this work æ).

I. As an initial: A Latin diphthong corresponding to the Greek ai (ai), and used chiefly in words originally derived from the Greek language. When fully naturalised in English the Greek ai (ai) and Lat. æ become simply e. Thus the Gr. αἰθήρ (aithēr) is in Lat. æther. In Eng. some writers, Tyndall for one, looking on the word as but partially naturalised, still write it with the diphthong æther; whilst the generality, regarding it as fully naturalised, make it ether. [ÆTHĒR.]

¶ Quite a multitude of Anglo-Saxon words commence with æ, but the æ becomes changed in various ways when these are naturalised in English. It is often transformed into a or e, less frequently into ee, or ea, or o, or aw, or oi, or oa; or it is wholly omitted.

Examples:

- 1. As a. A.S. æse, ær = Eng. axe; æorn = acorn; æfter = after; ænde = and; ængel = angel; æpp, æppel, &c. = apple; æt = at. 2. As e. A.S. æbbung = Eng. ebbing; æfen, æfenn = even; ælf = elf; æmetta, æmette = emmet, ant; Ænglisc = English. 3. As ee. A.S. æl = Eng. el. 4. As ea. A.S. ætan = to eat; ærtian = to earn.

- 5. As o. A.S. æne = Eng. one. 6. As aw. A.S. æl = Eng. awl. 7. As oi. A.S. æl; = Eng. oil. 8. As oa. A.S. æ = Eng. oak. 9. With the æ wholly omitted. A.S. æbars = bare; ænd = and.

æ-díle, s. [Lat. ædilis, originally from ædes = (1) a sanctuary, a temple, (2) a dwelling for men.]

1. (Plural.) In ancient Rome: Magistrates who had charge of public and private buildings, of aqueducts, roads, sewers, weights, measures, the national worship, and, specially when there were no censors, public morality. There were two leading divisions of ædiles—plebeian and curule. Two of the former class were created in A. U. 260, to assist the tribunes in their judicial functions. The same number of curule ædiles were elected from the patricians A. U. 387, to perform certain public games. For a time these officers were chosen alternately from the patricians and the plebeians, then they were taken indiscriminately from either of these castes. Their insignia of office were like those of the old kings—the toga prætæta (a purple robe) and the sella curule, or curule chair, ornamented with ivory. To the ordinary twp plebeian ædiles Julius Cæsar added another pair, called cæreal ædiles, to look after the corn supplies and the food of the capital generally.

2. The term ædile is sometimes applied to the President of the Board of Works and Public Buildings, who is a member of the British Government, but does not belong to the Cabinet. His duties are not, however, in all respects similar to those of the old Roman ædiles, for whilst, like them, he looks after public buildings, he regards some other matters which they regulated as properly appertaining to other functionaries, or as fitted rather for private enterprise than for direct government management.

"Flavius was a scriba, or clerk, the son of a freedman, and of humble origin; but this act obtained him such popularity that he was elected curule ædile in the year 84 A.C."—Lewis: Early Rom. Hist., ch. v., § 1.

It appears to be the stock whence all the varieties of the domestic goat sprung. The male has large horns, whilst those of the female are short or wanting. It inhabits the Caucasus and the mountains of Persia, and is still more abundant in Asia Minor. It may possibly be wild even in the Alps and the Pyrenees, though the identity of species from these various localities has been doubted. It is gregarious. "A wind that through the corridor Just stirs the curtain, and no more, And, touching the Æolian strings, Faints with the burden that it brings!" Longfellow: Golden Legend.

Æolian harp, s. A harp played by Æolus—in other words, by the wind. It is made by stretching strings of catgut over a wooden sound-box. If exposed to the action of the wind, a succession of pleasing sounds proceeds from it, plaintive when the breeze is slight, but bolder as it increases in force.

"As an Æolian harp through gusty doors Of some old ruin its wild music pours." Longfellow: The Student's Tale.

"Like an Æolian harp that wakes No certain air, but overleaves Fate thought with music that it makes." Tennyson: Two Voices.

Eolic digamma: A letter similar in character and sound to the letter F. It is so called because the Eolians used to prefix it to certain words beginning with a vowel, and insert it between vowels in the middle of words. It does not appear as a letter of the ordinary classical Greek alphabet.

Gr. αἰών (aiōn) = (1) a period of time, (spec.) a life-time, a generation; (2) a long space of time, eternity; (3) a space of time clearly marked out, a period, an age, a dispensation. (Liddell & Scott.) ¶ The Lat. æon, given above, which is simply the Gr. αἰών (aiōn), with the substitution of the Lat. diphthong æ for the Gr. ai, is rare. The common Lat. word is ævum, which is used in poetry in most of the senses of αἰών, and is simply that Gr. term Latinised, the inserted v being the remains of the Eolic digamma (q.v.) Cognate words are Goth. awis, crude form awa. Bopp, Graff, and Kuhn derive all these terms from Sansc. ī = to go.]

The eggs were 12½ inches in length, and had a capacity equal to six ostrich eggs, or to 148 of the domestic fowl. The remains were found in alluvial soil, and were, geologically viewed, so recent that it is open to question whether living specimens may not yet be found in the unexplored parts of Madagascar.

bēl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, çenophon, exist. ph = z -tia = shē-ç; -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -çion, -çion = zhūn. -tious, -sious, -çious = shūs. -ble, &c. = bēl.

which not merely presents the various objects of the relative size which, by the laws of perspective, they must assume when viewed from the observer's stand-point, but also succeeds in imparting effects as if they were seen with their outline softened by the action of air. (Mosheim: Ch. Hist., Cent. IV.)

It derives its name from the fact that the species appear to derive their principal nourishment from the air, as they can exist for weeks in their native clime, and send forth blossom after blossom while hung up in a room quite away from the vegetable soil. Their flowers are beautiful and finely fragrant. The A. odoratum is sometimes kept in green-houses in Britain, but rarely flowers.

ā-ēr-ōl-īte, †ā-ēr-ōl-īth, s. [In Gr. αερόλιθ; Fr. aérolithe; Port. aerolithe, aerolito; fr. Gr. ἀήρ (aēr) = the air; λίθος (lithos) = a stone.] A stone which falls from the air or sky. The name is somewhat inappropriate now that it is known that the connection of these stones with the air is but slight, they simply traversing it as, under the operation of gravity, they fall from the regions beyond to the earth. They have also received the name of meteorites, from the fact that the fall of one or more aërolites is generally preceded by the appearance of a meteoric fire-ball, which, after gleaming forth for a brief period, then explodes, irresistibly suggesting the inference that the aërolites which fall constitute its fragments. Hence in many scientific reports aërolites and large meteors are classed under one category. Sometimes aërolite and meteorite are made quite synonymous terms; but it is better to draw a distinction between the two, making meteorite the general word and limiting aërolite to the stony varieties of the genus. This is done by Prof. Maskelyne in his "Guide to the Collection of Minerals in the British Museum." The aërolites in this limited sense, as a rule, fall to the ground in an incandescent state. They are generally sub-angular, but with the angular points rounded off, and are coated to the depth of about a quarter of a line, with a black crust like varnish. When fractured they commonly display a series of small grey spherical bodies in a gritty substance, occasionally with yellow spots interspersed. When thus consisting of stony spherules they are sometimes termed chondritic aërolites, from Gr. χονδρίτις (chondritis) = of the shape or size of groats; χόνδρος (chondros) = a corn, grain, groat. Iron is found in large quantity in nearly every aërolite, sometimes malleable, and sometimes in a state of oxide. It is always in connection with nickel. Other substances found in more limited quantity in aërolites are silica, magnesia, sulphur, alumina, lime, manganese, chrome, cobalt, carbon, soda, and water. No new element has been found, but the combination of the old ones is different from any occurring in this planet.

Though the fact that stones could fall from the sky to the earth was doubted by the scientific almost till the close of the eighteenth century, the occurrence of such a phenomenon had been again and again popularly reported in various countries, and from a high period of antiquity. There is reason to believe that the object of worship in many a pagan shrine in ancient times was an aërolite; that this was the case with the idol worshipped in the great temple of Diana at Ephesus is all but implied in the town-clerk's words, "The image which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts xix. 35). Among the notable aërolites in the British Museum collection may be enumerated a great chondritic one, which fell at Parallee, in Madras, on February 26th, 1837; one which descended at Basti, in India, on December 2, 1852, and is remarkable for containing crystalline calcium sulphide, associated with enstatite and augite; and, finally, the carbonaceous stones which came down at Cold Bokkeveldt, Kaba, Groanja, and Montauban. [AEROSIDERITE, METEORITE, SIDERITE.]

course.] The science which treats of the air. When little could be done in this department of knowledge except to record facts, aërography (a writing about or a description of the air) was an appropriate enough name; but now that the causes of many aerial phenomena are becoming known, aërology (a discourse or reasoning about the air) is the more suitable term.

ā-ēr-ō-mān-ŷŷ, *ā-ēr-ō-mān-tīe, or *ā-ēr-ē-mān-ŷŷ, a. [In Fr. aëromancie; Ital. aerimanza; Lat. aëromantia, from Gr. ἀεραμαντεία (aeromanteia): ἀήρ (aēr) = air, and μαντεία (mantēia) = divination.] Divination by means of the air and its movements.

"He templeth ofte, and seek also Aëromancy in judgement."—Gower MS., Soc. Antiq., 134, l. (Halliwell.)

In a general sense: Any instrument for "measuring the air."

Gr. ἀήρ (aēr) = the air; μέτρον (metron) = a measure.] The science which "measures the air," that is, ascertains the mean bulk of the several gases of which it consists, with their pressure, elasticity, rarefaction, and condensation. Pneumatics is the term more commonly employed.

"Waldus, in lieu of pneumatic, uses the word aërometry, q. d., the art of measuring the air."—Ency. Londin., art. "Pneumatics."

ā-ēr-ōn-ānt, s. [In Fr. aéronauts, fr. Lat. aër = the air, and navis = a sailor; or fr. Gr. ἀήρ (aēr) = the air; ναύτης (nautēs) = sailor; ναῦς (naus) = a ship.]

I. Lit.: A human being or one of the inferior animals navigating the air.

"The little aëronaut, as soon as it arrived on board, was very active, running about, sometimes letting itself fall, and then re-ascending the same thread."—Berain: Voyage round the World, ch. viii.

II. Fig.: One who commits himself to a political or other scheme, beautiful for a spectator to contemplate, but very perilous to the operator.

"Let us be satisfied to admire rather than attempt to follow the aëronauts of France."—Burke.

ā-ēr-ōn-āu-tīc, a. [(1) Lat. aër = the air, or Gr. ἀήρ (aēr) = the air; (2) Lat. naviticus, Gr. ναυτικός (navitikos) = nautical, pertaining to ships.] Pertaining to the navigation of the air by means of balloons, or in some similar way.

ā-ēr-ōn-āu-tīcs, s. [In Fr. aéronautique.] The science or art which treats of aërial navigation. With the example before him of birds created anatomically on a type in some essential particulars similar to his own, man was certain to covet and seek to attain the art of flying. Two fatal difficulties, however, appear for ever to forbid his success in this endeavour unless he be assisted by machinery to supplement his physical defects. Compared with a bird he is proportionately heavier, and that to no slight extent; whilst, in addition to this, the conformation of his breast does not afford a proper point of attachment for the powerful muscles required to use his arms after the manner of wings. Any one carving the breast of a fowl can at once perceive the superiority in this respect, even of that type of bird, to the strongest man. To affix wings to the arms is useless, if the latter are too weak to turn them to account. From the half, if not wholly, mythic Icarus to the "Flying-man," who ascended from London in 1874, failure of the most disastrous kind has attended every effort to "fly" (but see BALLOON and BALLOONING).

† ā-ēr-ōn-āu-tism, s. [Eng. aeronaut; -ism.] The same as AERONAUTICS (q. v.).

ā-ēr-ō-phō-bī-a, s. [Gr. ἀήρ (air) = air, and φόβος (phobos) = fear; fr. φειδόμεαι (phedomai) = to fear.] Med.: Dread of the wind or fresh air, a morbid symptom in hydrophobia and some other diseases.

ā-ēr-ō-phŷte, s. [Gr. ἀήρ (air) = air, and φυτόν (phuton) = a plant, a tree; φύω (phuo) = to bring forth.] A plant which lives exclusively in the air, a parasitical plant. Many Orchids are aërophyles, and a fungus akin to Mucor is called Aërophyton.

ā-ēr-ō-planē, s. A flying machine, of a bird-like construction, having two compressed-air propellers, two laterally extended wings and a steering tail. Invented 1879.

Bot.: Horse-chestnuts. A genus of plants of the order Sapindaceæ, Soap-worts, and the section Hippocastaneæ. One species, the Æ. hippocastanum, the Horse-chestnut, is well known in Britain, where, however, it is not indigenous. It is supposed to have been introduced into Europe from Northern India, or some other part of Asia, about the middle of the sixteenth century. Its pyramidal inflorescence is much admired. It has the unusual number of seven stamens. Its leaves are digitate, and seven in number. The seeds are excellent for feeding sheep upon. The bark has been recommended for fever-patients. A decoction has been tried in gangrene, and the powder has been used as an emollient. The young leaves are aromatic, and have been used as hops in brewing beer. (BUCKLEY.) not till the latter have had proper scope accorded them that the former gain power enough to act. The delight in painting, music, sculpture, poetry, and the drama, nay, even in fine mathematical demonstrations, is æsthetic; and the science investigates the origin of such sensations, the laws which characterise them, and the excellent effects which, when they are not abused, result from their operation to humanity. The word æstivation is separately applied to the calyx, the corolla, the stamens, and the pistil, but not to the flower in general. There are many kinds of æstivation. It may be imbricated, or valvate, or convolute, or circinate, or twisted, or of various other types.

When it appears on a stove plant, the latter should be dusted with quicklime or salt. (Treasury of Bot., &c.)

Æth-el, Æth-el, Æth-el, s. [A.S.] In compos. = noble. Used in proper names, as Ethelbert, Ethelred, Ethelwulf, Ethelwald, Athelstane.

It consisted of two glass bulbs united by a vertical glass tube so narrow that a little column of liquid was supported in the tube by its own adhesion. The lower bulb was protected by a metallic envelope, and gave the temperature of the air, whilst the upper one was blackened, and was surrounded by a metallic cap, designed to protect the bulb from terrestrial radiation. "The sensibility of the instrument," says its inventor, "is very striking, for the liquor incessantly falls and rises in the stem with every passing cloud." (See Tyndall on Heat, 3rd ed., 1868, p. 367.)

æ-thū-ŕa, s. [In Fr. æthuse; Gr. αἰθή (aithō) = to light up, to kindle, to burn. The name is given from its acridness.] Lesser Hemlock, or Fool's Parsley. A genus of plants belonging to the order Apiceae, or Umbellifera. The Æ. cynapium, or Fool's Parsley, occurs in Britain. In aspect it partly resembles garden parsley, but is darker in colour, and is not curled. Its odour is unpleasant. It is so acrid as to be poisonous. As an antidote, Dr. Christison recommends that milk be swallowed, that mustard-poultices be applied to the legs, and that the body be sponged with vinegar.

* ā-ē-tī-tēs, s. [Lat. acitites; Gr. ἀετίτης (aetites); from ἀετός (aetos) = an eagle.] The eagle-stone: a nodule or pebble which received its name from the belief that the eagle transported it to its nest, knowing that it would not be possible without it to hatch its eggs. Nor were these its only reputed virtues. Thieves could be discovered by its aid; and, according to Lupton, it was a charm to be used by women in childbirth, and produced love between man and wife. Kersey's definition of it is, "The eagle-stone, a certain stone which, when shaken, rattles as if there were another within it." Any pebble or nodule answering to this description would have been called acitites, or eagle-stone; but, apparently, the term was most frequently used of those nodules found abundantly in the Carboniferous strata, which are hollow in place of solid, or have what was once a cavity filled up with clay ironstone in a pulverulent state. It is unnecessary to add that the acitites possessed none of the virtues attributed to it by the credulous in pre-scientific times.

"And so both the acitites, or eagle-stone, which hath a little stone within it."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., Cent. II, § 154.

ā-ē-tō-bā-tēs, s. [Gr. ἀετός (aetos); αἰετός (aietos) = (1) an eagle, (2) a fish, the white ray; βαρίς (batis) = a fish, probably the skate.] A genus of fossil fishes from the London clay of the Isle of Sheppey. It was founded by Agassiz, and is allied to the Rays.

af-fin-i-ty, s. [In Ger. affinität; Fr. affinité; Ital. affinità, fr. Lat. affinitas = (1) neighbourhood, (2) relationship by marriage, (3) union, connection.]

I. Ordinary Language & Law:

1. Lit.: The relationship contracted by marriage between a husband and his wife's kindred, or between a wife and her husband's kindred. It is opposed to consanguinity, or natural relationship by blood. It is of three kinds: (1) direct, viz., that subsisting between a husband and his wife's blood relations, and vice versa; (2) secondary, or that which subsists between a husband and his wife's relations by marriage; and (3) collateral, or that which subsists between a husband and the relations of his wife's relations.

¶ The word affinity in this, as other meanings, may be followed by with, to, or between.

3. Fig.: The resemblance produced, more or less remotely, by a common origin between languages now in many respects distinct. Or generally, the similarity between things which essentially resemble each other.

"There is a close affinity between imposture and credibility."—Lewis: Influence of Authority, ch. iii.

II. Biol. Sing. & plur.: A resemblance, or resemblances, on essential points of structure between species, genera, orders, classes, &c., really akin to each other, and which should be placed side by side in any natural system of classification. To this Mr. Darwin would add that the resemblances arise from the fact that the species in which they occur were derived at a more or less remote date from a common ancestor. Affinity differs from analogy, the latter term being applied to resemblances between animals or plants not really akin, but which ought to be more or less widely separated in classifications. Thus the falcons, the hawks, the eagles, &c., are related to each other by genuine affinity; but the similarity on certain points, such as the possession of retractile claws, between the raptorial birds and the fine race of mammals, is one only of analogy.

"We can understand, on these views, the very important distinction between real affinities and analogical or adoptive resemblances."—Darwin: Origin of Species, ch. xii.

"... the nature of the affinities which connect together whole groups of organisms."—Ibid., pt. 1, ch. l.

III. Chemistry:

1. Chemical affinity, or chemical attraction, is the force by which union takes place between two or more elements to form a chemical compound. According to another definition, it is a force exerted between two or more bodies at an infinitely minute distance apart, by which they give rise to a new substance having different properties to those of its component parts. Elements have the greatest affinity for other elements which differ most in their chemical properties. Thus H has great affinity for Cl and O, but the affinity between O and Cl is much weaker.

Acids unite readily with alkalies, most metals with sulphur. When two salts are mixed together they are decomposed if an insoluble substance can be formed: thus AgNO<sub>3</sub> + NaCl yields NaNO<sub>3</sub> and insoluble AgCl, and BaCl<sub>2</sub> + MgSO<sub>4</sub> yields MgCl<sub>2</sub> and insoluble BaSO<sub>4</sub>. A generally acid expels a weaker one, as H<sub>2</sub>SO<sub>4</sub> expels HCl or CO<sub>2</sub>, and CO<sub>2</sub> precipitates SiO<sub>2</sub>; but when two salts are fused, if a more volatile compound is formed, it is driven off, as when NH<sub>4</sub>Cl is heated with dry CaCO<sub>3</sub>, then (NH<sub>4</sub>)<sub>2</sub>CO<sub>3</sub> volatilises. SiO<sub>2</sub> fused with salts expels the strongest acids and forms silicates. Iron filings heated to redness in a tube decomposes the vapour of water, but H<sub>2</sub> passed over red-hot oxide of iron reduces it to a metallic state. These reactions are due to the diffusion of gases, the resulting gas being diffused through the mass of vapour passing through the tube. The relative affinities between different substances varies with their temperature, insolubility, and power of vaporisation. The nascent state is favourable to chemical combination; thus H and N unite readily when organic matter containing N is decomposed by heat or putrefaction, also H with S. This is due to the bonds of the atoms being liberated at the moment of decomposition.

Disposing affinity is the action of a third body, which brings about the union of two other bodies, as Ag + SiO<sub>2</sub> and alkali forms a silicate of silver; Pt is attacked by fused KHO. Organic decompositions in the presence of caustic alkali, or lime, are also examples. Catalysis is the action of a body to bring about a chemical reaction whilst the body itself undergoes no perceptible change, as MnO<sub>2</sub> in the preparation of O from KClO<sub>3</sub>. Certain chemical compounds at high temperatures are dissociated from each other, as NH<sub>4</sub>Cl at high temperatures forms NH<sub>3</sub> + HCl. Chemical union is promoted by finely dividing the substances; thus finely-divided metals, as iron or lead, take fire in the air, uniting with O. Alteration of temperature alters the affinity; thus mercury heated to its boiling-point absorbs oxygen, which it liberates at a higher temperature; also BaO absorbs O at a low heat, forming BaO<sub>2</sub>, and gives it off at higher temperatures. Strong bases generally replace weaker bases; thus alkalies precipitate oxides of iron, &c.

"The affinities which held together the elements of the organic substances is destroyed by the cause which occasioned their death, and they are set free to obey new affinities and form new compounds."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., l. 12.

2. Affinity of solution is such an affinity as exists between a soluble salt and the fluid in which it is dissolved. Till the liquid is saturated with the salt the two can combine in an indefinite ratio, instead of being limited to the fixed proportions in which alone chemical affinity operates.

Ital. affrontare = to engage in front, to attack;
all from Lat. ad = to, and frons, genit. frontis =
the forehead, the front.] [FRONT.]

A. Transitive:

Essential meaning: To meet face to face, to confront.

¶ Trench considers affront to have originally meant to strike on the face. Wedgwood and many others think it was to meet face to face.

1. To do so without its being implied that each an encounter is a hostile one.

"For we have closely sent for Hamlet hither;
That he, as 'twere by accident, may here,
Affront Ophelia."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, III. 1.

2. To do so with the implied meaning that the encounter is hostile.

Who him affronting some to fight was ready prest."

one, either in his presence or in his absence.

grossly affronted shrood if he had not first been affronted at home."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxv.

B. Intransitive: To offer an insult to.

¶ In the example there is probably an ellipsis to be supplied, in which case the verb would become transitive.

"Your preparation can affront no less Than what you hear of; come more, for more you're ready."—Shakespeare: Cymbeline, IV. 8.

too great presumption was defeated; upon the sense of which affront he died with grief."—Ainslie: Coins.

treatment by word or demeanour; an insult, or something which, falling short of insult, is still fitted to stir up resentment.

"He had been apprehensive that this common people, who during his absence had given so many proofs of their aversion to Popery, would offer him some affront."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. x.

¶ In this sense the word may be used of

Or it may be, as it generally is, an adverb = again, as againbuy = to buy again, to redeem. If its numerous obsolete compounds were arranged according to the precise spelling of again in the individual example given to illustrate them, some would require to figure under again, others under agen, or agean, or ageyn.

It has been thought better to bring them together, and to effect this the form again has been assumed to exist in all cases, that actually found being placed after it. The same system will be adopted in similar cases throughout the Dictionary.

Church History: "A love-feast," a kind of feast held by the primitive Christians in connection with the administration of the sacred communion. Either before or after the Lord's Supper—it is not completely decided which—the Christians sat down to a feast provided by the richer members, but to which all, however poor, who belonged to the Church, were invited. As piety declined, the Agapæ began to cause scandal, and finally they were condemned by the Council of Laodicea and the 3rd of Carthage, in the fourth century, and by that of Orleans in A.D. 541. It was, however, found hard to eradicate them, and finally the Council in Trullo, A.D. 692, launched the penalty of excommunication against those who, in defiance of previous prohibitions, persisted in carrying them on.

Under this heading five sub-varieties are enumerated, of which the Agaric Mineral, called also Rock-milk, is the fourth, the others being Stalactites, Stalagmite, Calc-sinter, and Rock-meal. Agaric mineral is either yellowish or greyish-white. äg-är-ic-üs, s.; pl. äg-är-ic-ÿ. [Gr. ἀγαρίκος (agarikon),] [ΑΓΑΡΙΚΟΙ.] A genus of plants, the typical one of the Fungus or Mushroom family, consisting of the species which possess a fleshy pileus or cap, with a number of nearly parallel or radiating plates or gills on its lower side, bearing spores, the whole being supported upon a more or less lengthened stalk. More than one thousand species are known. They may be separated into five natural divisions, according as the colour of the spores is white, pink, ferruginous, purple-brown, or black. There are many sub-genera. Some species are poisonous. It is difficult to identify these with the accuracy which the importance of the subject demands; but the following marks have been given:—An agaric is poisonous, or at least suspicious, if it has a very thin cap compared with the thickness of the gills, if the stalk grows from one side of the cap, if the gills are of equal length, if the juice is milky, if it speedily decays into a dark watery fluid, if the collar round it is like a spider's web. All these characteristics do not meet in the same individual, but the presence of one or more of them is enough to inspire caution. The edible agarics, British and foreign, are the A. campestris, or Common Mushroom—that often cultivated in gardens; the A. Georgii; the A. pratensis, or Fairy-ring Mushroom; the A. perennis, &c. The A. cantharellus, piperatus, &c., contain sganary matter, considered by Liebig to be mannite. The agaric of the olive is poisonous, but pickling and subsequent washing render it harmless, as has been ascertained by experience in the Cévennes. Similarly, the application of vinegar and salt deprives the poisonous A. bulbosus of its noxious qualities; but too much caution cannot be used in experimenting upon such dangerous articles of food. A curious circumstance about some agarics, such as the A. Gardneri of Brazil and the A. olivarius of the south of Europe, is that they are luminous.

I. Min.: A mineral classed by Dana as one of the cryptocrystalline varieties of quartz, some of the other minerals falling under the same category being chalcodyne, carnelian, onyx, hornstone, and jasper. Phillips, and the earlier school of mineralogists, had made quartz and chalcodyne different minerals, and placed agate under the latter species. The classifications differ but little; for Dana defines agate as a variegated chalcodyne. He subdivides agates by their colours into those which are banded, those in clouds, and those whose hues are due to visible impurities. Under the first category is reckoned the eye-agate, and under the third the moss-agate, or mocha-stone, and the dendritic agate. Other terms sometimes used are ribbon-agate, brecciated agate, fortification agate, &c. Of these the most familiar is the fortification agate, or Scotch pebble, found in smygdaloid, and with layers and markings not unlike a fortification. Moss-agate does not, as the name would lead one to infer, contain moss, the appearance of that form of vegetation being produced, in most cases at least, by an infiltration of mineral matter.

II. Bot. [In Fr. agave; Sp. & Port. agave.] A genus of plants belonging to the order Amaryllidaceae, or Amaryllids. The species have large fleshy leaves, with teeth ending in spinous points. From the centre of a circle of these leaves there rises, as the plant approaches maturity, a tall scape of flowers. The idea that the agave flowers but once in a hundred years is, as Dr. Lindley says, a gardener's fable; what really happens is, that the plant taking many years (ten to seventy it is thought) to come to maturity, flowers but once, and then dies. The best known species is the Agave Americana, or American Aloe. The hard and spiny leaves of this fine endogen form impenetrable hedges. The fibre is tough enough to make excellent cordage. The expressed juice may be employed as a substitute for soap. It may also be manufactured into a liquor like cider. The root is diuretic and antispyllitic. The plant is now cultivated in the south of Europe. The A. Mexicana has similar properties to those of the A. Americana. The A. saponaria is a powerful detergent, and its roots are used as a substitute for soap. (Lindley: Vegetable Kingdom, 1847, pp. 157, 158.)

A. Ordinary Language:
I. Of organized beings, taken singly:
1. The whole duration of an organized being who or which has a term of existence and then passes away.
"... so the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and seven years."—Gen. xlvii. 23.
2. That portion of the existences of an organized being which has already gone by.
"And straightway the dame arose, and walked; for she was of the age of twelve years."—Mark v. 42.
3. The latter part of life; oldness.
"And there was one Anna, a prophetess, . . . she was of a great age . . ."—Luke ii. 36.
4. One of the stages of human life, as the ages of infancy, of youth, of manhood or of womanhood, and of decline. [B. I., Physiol.]
"And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages. At first, the infant, Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms;
And then the whining school-boy, with his satchel,
And shining morning face, creeping like small Unwillingly to school: And then, the lover,
Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad
Made to his mistress' eye-brow; Then, a soldier
Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard, Jealous in honour, sudden and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth; And then, the justice,
In fair round belly, with good capable lines,
With eyes severe, and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws and modern instances,
And so he plays his part; The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipshod pantaloon;
With spectacles on nose, and pouch on side;
His youthful hose well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank; and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish pipe
And whistles in his sound: Last scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness and mere oblivion;
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans every thing."
Shakspeare: An You Like It, li. 7.
5. The time at which man or any other organized being reaches maturity. (B., Law).
"But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age."—Heb. v. 14.
6. The time at which women cease to bear children.

"Through faith also Sara herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age."—Heb. xi. 11.

II. Of organized beings, viewed collectively:

1. The time required for a generation of mankind to pass away. [GENERATION.]

2. Those who are contemporaries on the earth at a certain time.

"Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men."—Eph. iii. 5.

"Yet I doubt not thro' the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widen'd with the process of the suns."—Tennyson: Locksley Hall.

III. Of unorganized beings: The time during which an unorganized being has existed in the same state, as the age of the moon, &c., the time since it was new moon.
"As the moon gains age, . . ."—Nerschel: Astron., 5th ed. (1858), § 417.

IV. Of time or duration in general:

1. A particular period of time marked by certain characteristics which distinguish it from others. Thus the Greeks and Romans imagined an age of gold, an age of silver, an age of brass, and an age of iron, Hesiod intercalating also before the fourth of these ones of heroes.

"I venture one remark, however, upon Hesiod's very beautiful account of the Ægæ. . . . Beginning with the Golden, he comes next to the Silver Ægæ, and then to Brass. But instead of descending forthwith the fourth and last step to the Iron Ægæ, he very singularly retraces his steps, and breaks the downward chain by an Ægæ of Heroes. . . . After this the scale drops at once to the lowest point, the Iron Ægæ—the ægæ of sheer wickedness and corruption."—Gladstone: Studies on Homer, l. 88.
[See also B., Archæol.]

"Those who compare the ægæ on which their lot has fallen with a golden ægæ which exists only in their imagination may talk of degeneracy and decay."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. 1.

"... in the literary ægæ of Rome."—Lewis: Early Rom. Hist., ch. v., § 13.

2. A century, one hundred years.

3. Colloquially: A long time, as "I have not seen you for an ægæ."
". . . and suffering thus, he made Minutes an ægæ."—Tennyson: Geraint and Enid.

B. Technically:

1. Physiol. If the word ægæ be used in the now all but obsolete sense given under A., 1, 4, &c., as one of the stages of human life, then physiology clearly distinguishes six of these: viz., the periods of infancy, of childhood, of boyhood or girlhood, of adolescence, of manhood or womanhood, and of old age. The period of infancy terminates at two, when the first dentition is completed; that of childhood at seven or eight, when the second dentition is finished; that of boyhood or girlhood at the commencement of puberty, which in Britain is from the fourteenth to the sixteenth year in the male, and from the twelfth to the fourteenth in the female; that of adolescence extends to the twenty-fourth year in the male and the twentieth in the female; that of manhood or womanhood stretches on till the advent of old age, which comes sooner or later, according to the original strength of the constitution in each individual case, and the habits which have been acquired during life. The precise time of human existence similarly varies.

2. Law: The time of competence to do certain acts. In the male sex, fourteen is the age when partial discretion is supposed to be reached, whilst twenty-one is the period of full age. Under seven no boy can be capitally punished; from seven to fourteen it is doubtful if he can; at fourteen he may. At twelve a girl can contract a binding marriage; at twenty-one she is of full age. In mediæval times, when a girl reached seven, by feudal custom or law, a lord might distract his tenants for aid [A. B., 1] to marry, or rather betroth her; at nine she was dowable; at twelve she could confirm any consent to marriage which she had previously given; at fourteen she could take the management of her lands into her own hands; at sixteen she ceased, as is still the law, to be under the control of her guardian; and at twenty-one she might alienate lands and tenements belonging to her in her own right.

* Age-prayer, * age-prayer (lit. = a praying of age): A plea put forth by a minor who has to defend an action designed to deprive him of his hereditary lands, to defer proceedings till he is twenty-one years old. It is generally granted.

3. Archæol.: In the same sense as A., II. 2. The Danish and Swedish antiquaries and naturalista, MM. Nilson, Steenstrup, Forchhammer, Thomsen, Worsaae, and others, have divided the period during which man has existed on the earth into three—the age of stone, the age of bronze, and the age of iron. During the first-mentioned of these he is supposed to have had only stone for weapons, &c. Sir John Lubbock divides this into two—the Paleolithic or Older, and the Neolithic or Newer stone period. [PALÆOLITHIC, NEO-LITHIC.] At the commencement of the age of bronze that composite metal became known, and began to be manufactured into weapons and other instruments; whilst when the age of iron came in, bronze began gradually to be superseded by the last-mentioned metal. (Yell: The Antiquity of Man. Lubbock: Pre-historic Times.)

"The question which now supersedes the agrarian movement in importance, is the proposal for a code of written laws made by the tribune Terentillus."—Lewis: Early Rom. Hist., ch. xii., pt. iii., § 36.
 The Agrarian Laws, in the ancient Roman republic, were laws of which the most important were those carried by C. Licinius Stolo, when tribune of the people, in B.C. 367. The second rogation, among other enactments, provided (1) that no one should occupy more than 500 jugera (by one calculation about 250, and by another 333, English acres) of the public lands, or have more than 100 large and 500 small cattle grazing upon them; (2) that each portion of the public lands above 500 jugera as was in possession of individuals should be divided amongst all the plebeians, in lots of 7 jugera, as property; (3) that the occupiers of public land were bound to employ free labourers, in a certain fixed proportion to the extent of their occupation. When at a later period efforts were made to revive the Licinian rogations, such opposition was excited that the two Gracchi lost their lives in consequence, and this, with their other projects, proved abortive. It is important to note that the land with which the Licinian or "agrarian" laws dealt was public land belonging to the state, and not, as is popularly supposed, private property.

"The real opposition to an agrarian law arose from those who, by occupying the nonappropriated land of the state, and employing their capital and slaves in its cultivation, had acquired a possessory right to it."—Lewis: Early Rom. Hist., ch. xii., pt. ii., § 28.

It is also cognate with the Goth. akrs, the Ger. acker, and the Eng. acre.] Essential meaning = earth till, earth tillage. (Beames: Early England.)

1. In a general sense: The art of cultivating the ground, whether by pasturage, by tillage, or by gardening. In many countries the progress of human economical and social development has been from the savage state to hunting and fishing, from these to the pastoral state, from it again to agriculture properly so called, and thence, finally, to commerce and manufactures; though even in the most advanced countries every one of the stages now mentioned, excepting only the first, and in part the second, still exist and flourish. The tillage of the soil has existed from a remote period of antiquity, and experience has from time to time improved the processes adopted and the instruments in use; but it is not till a very recent period that the necessity of basing the occupation of the farmer on physical and other science has been even partially recognised. Now a division is made into theoretical and practical agriculture, the former investigating the scientific principles on which the cultivation of the soil should be conducted, and the best methods of carrying them out; and the latter actually doing so in practice.

The soil used for agricultural purposes is mainly derived from subadjacent rocks, which cannot be properly understood without some knowledge of geology, while a study of the dip and strike of the rocks will also be of use in determining the most suitable directions for drains and places for wells. The composition of the soil, manures, &c., requires for its determination agricultural chemistry. The weather cannot be properly understood without meteorology. The plants cultivated, the weeds requiring extirpation, the fungous growths which often do extensive and mysterious damage, fall under the province of botany; the domestic animals and the wild mammals, birds, and insects which prey on the produce of the field, under that of zoology. The complex machines and even the simplest implements are constructed upon principles revealed by natural philosophy; farm-buildings cannot be properly planned or constructed without a knowledge of architecture. Rents can be understood only by the student of political economy. Finally, farm-labourers cannot be governed or rendered loyal and trustworthy unless their superior knows the human heart, and acts on the Christian principle of doing to those under him as he would wish them, if his or their relative positions were reversed, to do to him. Information on the multifarious subjects bearing on agriculture will be found scattered throughout the work; it is not according to the plan pursued that they should be brought together in one place.

"And the art of agriculture, by a regular connection and consequence, introduced and established the idea of a more permanent property in the soil than had hitherto been received and adopted."—Blackstone: Comment. (1830), bk. ii., ch. i.

2. Spec.: Tillage, i.e. preparing the ground for the reception of crops, sowing or planting the latter, and in due time reaping them. In this sense it is contradistinguished from pasturage and even from ornamental gardening.

"That there was tillage bestowed upon the antediluvian ground, Moses does indeed intimate in general; what sort of tillage that was, is not expressed. I hope to show that their agriculture was nothing near so laborious and troublesome, nor did it take so much time as ours doth."—Woodward: Nat. Hist.

The calyx is 5 cleft, with hooked bristles, the petals 5, the stamens 7-20, the achenes 2. There are two British species, the A. eupatoria, or Common, and the A. odorata, or Fragrant Agrimony. It is to the former of these that the term agrimony is especially applied. It is a well-known and handsome plant, with long spikes of yellow flowers, and the cauline leaves interruptedly pinnate. Its spring root is sweet-accented, and the flowers when freshly gathered smell like apricots. A decoction of the flower is useful as a gargle, and has some celebrity as a vermifuge. It contains tannin, and dyes wool a nankeen colour. [See HEMP-AGRIMONY.]

The larvæ of three species—the A. lineatus, A. obscurus, and A. spectator—are too well known as wireworms destructive to crops. The perfect insects deposit their eggs on or near the roots of the plants on which they are designed to feed. The larvæ when hatched rapidly increase in size. They lie in the earth as pupæ during the winter months. The perfect insects usually emerge—the A. lineatus in March, and the other two in April. They are found abundantly till July. ä-güe, * ä-gew, * äg-wē, * hä-gē, s. [Skinner and Johnson, whom Wedgwood follows, take this from Fr. aigu = sharp, acute; in Sp. & Port. agudo. The primary meaning would then be an "acute" fever. Serenitus and Tooke derive it from the Goth. agis = trembling. Webster is from the same opinion, and cites as cognate words A.S. æge, eye, oga, hoga = fear, dread, horror; Arm. hegen = to shake; Irish aige = fear. "The radical idea," he says, "is a shaking or shivering similar to that occasioned by terror."]

* I Originally, in a general sense: Any sharp fever.

"But Iesu though his myght, blased mot he be, Reised him vpright, and passed that age." R. Brunne, p. 333.

II. Hence in a limited sense:

1. An intermittent fever, in whatever stage of its progress or whatever its type. A person about to be seized by it generally feels somewhat indisposed for about a fortnight previously. Then he is seized with a shivering fit, which ushers in the cold stage of the disease. This passes at length into a hot stage, and it again into one characterised by great perspiration, which carries off the disorder for a time. The three leading types of ague are the quotidian, with an interval of twenty-four hours; the tertian, with one of forty-eight hours; and the quartan, with one of seventy-two hours. The remota or the proximate cause of ague is generally the exposure of the body to the malaria generated in marshes. The remedy is quinine or some other anti-periodic. [ANTI-PERIODIC.]

"And he will look as hollow as a ghost, As dim and meagre as an ague's fit." Shakesp.: King John, iii. 4.

2. Specially:

(a) Lit.: The cold fit, often accompanied by trembling or shaking, which constitutes the first of the three stages of intermittent fever. In the phrase "fever and ague," ague means the cold stage, and fever the hot one which succeeds it.

"Cold, shivering ague." Dryden: Palamon and Arcite.

(b) Fig.: Any shaking produced by cold, however removed it may be from the first stage of an intermittent fever.

III. As the rendering of a word of doubtful meaning:

The ague of Scripture. The Hebrew word קדדחח (qaddachath), Lev. xxvi. 16, which is translated "fever" in Deut. xxviii. 22, from the root קדח (qadachh) = to set on fire, is rendered in the Septuagint in Leviticus κτερος (kteros) = the jaundice, and in Deut. κτερος (kteros) = fever, especially of a tertian or quartan type. Probably a more formidable disease is meant than simple ague, or the word may be used in the extended sense of No. I.

"I also will do this unto you: I will even spend over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague; that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart: . . ."—Lev. xxvii. 16.

"Our soldiers in the Peninsular hospitals regularly applied for an ague-draught (6) drops of laudanum and a drachm of ether) when they saw their sails turning blue, which is generally the first sign of the commencement of a paroxysm."—Dr. Brown: Cycl. of Pract. Med., vol. II.

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, bk. xiii. 72.

4. Often in the plural: Affectation, an assumption of dignity to which one is not entitled, and which it would be inexpedient to parade even if he were.

Addison: Ram. on Italy.

B. Technically:

I. Natural Philosophy and Chemistry:

*I. Formerly: Any gas, whatever its composition.

"The division of bodies into airs, liquids, and solids."
Herschel: Study Nat. Philos. (1831), Lardner's Cyclop., p. 228.

*Phlogisticated air = nitrogen gas.

2. Now: The gaseous substance which fills the atmosphere surrounding our planet. It is elastic, and is destitute of taste, colour, and smell. It contains by weight, oxygen 23:10 parts, and of nitrogen 76:90; and by volume, of oxygen 20:90, and of nitrogen 79:10; or of 10,000 parts there are in perfectly dry air, of nitrogen 7,912, oxygen 2,080, carbonic acid 4, carburetted hydrogen 4, with a trace of ammonia. But air never is dry; it has always in it a varying amount of watery vapour. When exhaled from the lungs it is saturated with moisture, and contains about 4:35 parts of carbonic acid. The prevalence of this latter gas in abnormal quantity is prejudicial to human life, while air with a high per-centage of oxygen in it is healthful and invigorating. Dr. R. Angus Smith, F.R.S., found that the oxygen in the air of various localities varied as follows:—

Tops of hills, Scotland . . . . . 20.98.
Snburb of Manchester in wet westher . . . . . 20.98.

Average in 339 specimens of air in mines . . . . . 20.26.
When candles go out . . . . . 18.5.

Quart. Journ. of Science, li. (1865) 222-3.

The density of air being fixed at the round number 1,000, it is made the standard with which the specific gravity of other substances is compared. If water be made unity, then the specific gravity of dry air is .0012759. At 62° Fahr. it is 810 times lighter than water, and 11,000 times lighter than mercury. At the surface of the sea the mean pressure is sufficient to balance a column of mercury 30 inches, or one of water 34 feet in height. [ATMOSPHERE, ACOUSTICS, BAROMETER, PNEUMATICS, RESPIRATION.]

II. Music: A tune or melody. A melodic succession of notes as opposed to a harmonic combination. [TUNE, MELODY.]

"There is it souls sympathy with sounds,
And as the mind is pitch'd the ear is pleas'd."
Cosper: Task, bk. vi.

¶ Formerly, harmonised melodies were said to be airs in several parts, but the term is at present generally restricted to an unaccompanied tune, or the most prominent melody of a composition, as found usually in the highest part, whether in vocal or instrumental music.

III. Painting & Sculpture: Gesture, attitude; that which expresses the character of the action represented.

IV. Horsemanship (plur.): The artificial motion of a horse under direction.

air-atmosphere, s. The atmosphere consisting of or filled with air.

"... the lofty air-atmosphere."
Prof. Airy on Sound (1868), p. 8.

air-balloon, s. (1) Properly a balloon rendered lighter than the surrounding atmosphere by the rarefaction of the air within it; but (2) the word "air" may be used in the old sense for any gas, and the term "air-balloon" thus becomes simply a synonym for BALLOON (q.v.).

air-balloonist, s. One who makes or uses air-balloons. (Kirby.) air-bed, s. A "bed" or mattress made of air-tight cloth or vulcanized india-rubber, divided into compartments and inflated with air. Its disadvantage is that the air within it becomes heated by the warmth of the body. In this respect it is inferior to the water-bed, which is now generally used instead of it as an easy couch for the sick.

air-bladder, s. [Eng. air; bladder.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Any bladder filled with air.

II. Physiology:

1. Gen.: Any bladder or sac occurring in an animal or plant.

Owen: British Fossil Mammals and Birds, p. xiii.

air-bugs, s. pl. [Eng. air; bugs.]

Entom.: The English equivalent of Aurocorisa, the name given by Mr. Westwood to the Geococros, or Land-bugs, a tribe or section of the air-bored Heteroptera. [AUROCOCROIA, GEOCOCROS, LAND-BUGS.]

air-built, a. Built in the air or of air; constructed of baseless hopes by a wayward fancy; chimerical.

"Hence the fool's paradise, the statesman's scheme,
The air-built castle, and the golden dream."

Animal Physiol.: Certain cells existing in masses in the lungs, where they surround and terminate each lobular passage. In man they are but 1/16th of an inch in diameter; in the other mammals they are also very small. In birds they are not merely distributed over the chest and the abdomen, but they penetrate the quills, and in birds of powerful flight even the bones. They communicate with the lungs, afford a great extension to the surface with which the air inhaled comes in contact, and in consequence increase the heat and muscular energy of the bird, while at the same time diminishing its specific gravity. In insects some branches of the tracheæ dilate into air-receptacles, the number and size of which, like the air-cells in birds, are in direct relation with the powers of flight. (See Owen's Invertebrata, Lect. xvii.)

"On the exterior of a lobule [of the lungs] we observe bubbles of air of various sizes in its tissue; and if the bronchial tubes be injected the lobule is distended, and its exterior presents a number of bulgings known as the air-cells, about which much controversy has existed."
Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., li. 888, 889.

spaces which contain air, and are not receptacles of secretion. They are called by Link lacunae. They vary in size, figure, and arrangement. In water-plants they are designed to enable the plant to float in the stems of Grasses, Umbellifere, &c. They are caused by one part growing more quickly than another.

Mech.: One of the chambers in a suction and force-pump. [POMP.] (Atkinson: Ganot's Physics, 3rd ed., § 185.)

air-duct, s. The duct leading from the swim-bladder to the intestinal canal in some fishes.

air-engine, caloric engine, s. Any engine which has for its moving power heated air, that is, which employs air, like steam in a steam-engine, as a medium for transforming heat into mechanical energy. The best known air-engines have been those of the Rev. Dr. Stirling in 1816, Capt. Ericsson in 1833, and Mr. Philander Shaw in 1867. As yet they have been very partially successful. Were they so they would have this advantage among others over steam-engines, that air can with safety be raised to a higher temperature than steam, and therefore can generate a higher amount of mechanical energy.

air-escape, s. A contrivance for permitting the escape of the air which tends to accumulate till it obstructs the progress of the water in pipes led over a rising ground. It consists of a hollow vessel, having in its top a ball-cock, so adjusted that when air collects in the pipes it ascends into the vessel, and, displacing the water, causes the ball to descend till it opens the cock and allows the air to escape.

air-gossamer, s. [AIR-THREADS.]

air-gun, s. An instrument designed to propel balls by the elastic force of condensed air. A strong metal globe is formed, furnished with a small hole and a valve opening inwards. Into this hole a condensing syringe is screwed. When, by means of this apparatus, the condensation has been brought to the requisite point of intensity, the globe is detached from the syringe and screwed at the breech of a gun, so constructed that the valve may be opened by means of a trigger. A ball is then inserted in the barrel near the breech, so fitting it as to render it air-tight, and the trigger being pulled, the elasticity of the condensed air impels it with considerable force.

AIR-GUN.

A piece of simple mechanism may supply the barrel with ball after ball, and thus make re-loading after a discharge easy and rapid.

air-hammer, s. A hammer of which the moving power is compressed air.

air-jacket, s. A jacket having air-tight bladders or bags designed to be inflated, with the view of supporting the person wearing it in the water. The air-belt has now superseded it.

air-line, s. A straight line as if drawn through the air; the shortest distance between two points; hence a direct railroad line.

air-pipe, s. A pipe connecting the hold of a vessel with the furnace of a ship, and designed to convey the foul air of the hold to the furnace that it may be burnt. That this purpose may be effected, no air is allowed to reach the furnace for combustion excepting that of the hold supplied by the air-pipe.

air-plant, aerial plant, s. A plant which is capable of deriving its nutriment for a certain limited period from the air. The chief genera to which the name has been applied are Aërides, Vanilla, and Sarcanthus, all Orchids. [AERIDES.]

THE COMMON AIR-PUMP.

It was designed to exhaust the air from a receiver, but in reality it can do no more than reduce it to a high degree of rarefaction. The air-pump now generally in use is a considerable improvement on that of Guericke. A bell-formed "receiver" of glass is made to rest on a horizontal plate of thick glass ground perfectly smooth. In the centre of that plate, under the receiver, is an opening into a tube which, passing for some distance horizontally, ultimately branches at right angles into two portions, entering two upright cylinders of glass. The cylinders are firmly cemented to the glass plate, and within them are two pistons fitting them so closely as to be air-tight. Each piston is worked by a rack and pinion, turned by a handle; whilst each cylinder is fitted with a valve, so contrived that when the piston is raised, communication is opened between the cylinder and the receiver, which communication is again closed as the piston falls. It is evident that when any one commences to work the machine, the air in the cylinders will be immediately expelled the first upward motion that they are made to take. The valve will then fly open, and the air from the receiver will fill both the pistons as well as itself, though, of course, now in a somewhat rarefied state. As the same process is again and again repeated, the air will become increasingly rarefied, though, as stated above, an actual vacuum never can result from the action now described.

Bianchi's Air-pump is an improvement on the common one. It is made of iron, and has but one cylinder. It can be made larger than the common machine, and produces a so-called vacuum more quickly. It is described in Ganot's Physics, Atkinson's translation.

Sprengel's Air-pump is a form of air-pump of a totally different kind from the ordinary one. It depends on the principle of converting the space to be exhausted into a Torricellian vacuum. (Ibid., pp. 144, 145.) [VACUUM.]

Condensing air-pump, or condensing pump. [CONDENSING.]

Air-pump gauge: A gauge for testing the extent to which the air has been exhausted in the receiver of an air-pump. It consists of a glass tube bent like a siphon. One leg is closed, as in a barometer, the other open. It is placed under a small bell-jar communicating by a stop-cock with the receiver, and the more nearly the mercury stands at the same level, the more nearly has a vacuum been produced.

Air-pump of a condensing steam-engine: The pump which draws the condensed steam, with the air commingled with it and the condensed water, from the condenser, and casts them into the hot well.

air-sac, air-sack, s. [Eng. air; sac, sack.] [AIR-CELLS.]

"The bronchial tubes [in birds] open upon the surface of the lungs into air-sacs, which differ in number and in development in different birds."—Huxley: Classif. of Animals, xxvii., "Aves."

"The air-sacs on each side of the mouth of certain male frogs."—Darwin: Descent of Man, vol. II., chap. xiii.

air-shaft, s. A hole bored from the surface of the earth to some portion of the galleries of a mine for the purpose of ventilation. There should always be two—one, with a furnace under it, for vitiated air to ascend; the other, with no furnace, for pure air to descend. If there be but one, it requires to be divided longitudinally into two passages—the one for the ascending, and the other for the descending air.

air-ship, s. A balloon or aeroplane, particularly one that is dirigible or relatively so.

"... This plague was stayed at last By blasts of strong air-stirring Northern wind." Moy's Lutan, bk. vi.

air-stove, s. A stove, the heat of which is employed to warm a stream of air directed against the surface, which air is then admitted to the apartment of which the temperature is to be raised. The stove is enclosed in a casing somewhat larger than itself, so as to leave a space of a few inches between the two. At the lower part of the casing is an aperture fitted with a register to regulate the air-thermometer, s. An instrument which is designed to measure the degrees of heat by means of the expansion of air. When used to measure small differences of temperature, it is a capillary tube with a bulb at the upper end, and with its lower end plunged into a coloured liquid in a bottle. The air in the bulb at the top is heated, so as to cause a portion of it to be expelled, leaving the coloured liquid free to rise a certain distance in the tube. An alteration of temperature will then make the remainder of the air in the tube to expand or contract with the effect of making the liquid correspondingly fall or rise in the tube. Within certain limits it is a delicate thermometer, and was the first form of that instrument as invented in 1590, by Santorio, a physician of Padua. It can measure only the lower temperatures. When employed to note higher degrees of heat, a bent capillary tube is substituted for the straight one. It agrees with the mercurial thermometer up to 260°, but above that point mercury expands relatively more than air. The differential thermometer of Sir John Leslie is a modification of the air-thermometer. [DIFFERENTIAL THERMOMETER]

Kinnerley's Electric Air-Thermometer: An instrument consisting of a glass tube closed at both ends by air-tight brass caps, through which two wires slide in the direction of the axis of the tube. These wires are terminated by brass balls, which are made to approach within the striking distance. To an aperture in the bottom of the lower cap is fitted a bent tube of glass, which turns upwards, and is open at both ends; the bend is filled with mercury, or with a coloured fluid, which may indicate by its rising or falling within the tube any dilatation or contraction that may take place in the air within the vessel. Every time a spark passes between the brass balls the fluid suddenly rises, but descends again, to its old level immediately after the explosion.

air-threads, or air-gossamers, s. The name given to the long slender filaments often seen in autumn floating in the air. They have been darted out by spiders, especially the Aranea obtectria, which, mounting to the summit of a bush or tree, darts such threads out till it succeeds in lanching one strong enough to support it, and float it up into the air, which it desires to ascend in quest of prey.

"As from air-threatening tops of cedars tall." Mirror for Magistrates, p. 303.

air-tight, a. So tight as to prevent the passage of the air. (Used of a bottle or tube hermetically sealed.)

2. Physiol.: A tube or pipe in an organised being, designed for the reception or passage of air. The term is often used for the tracheæ of insects—tubes which pervade the bodies of these animals, as arteries and veins do our own, but with this essential difference, that they carry air instead of a circulating fluid; the arrangement in insects being that "the air is distributed by a vascular system over the reservoirs of blood, instead of the blood being distributed by a capillary network over a reservoir of air." (Owen: Invertebrata, § xvii.)

"... that series of air-cells associated by dependence on a single terminal air-tube." Todd & Bowman: Phys. Anat., vol. II., p. 388.

The phenomenon must have struck most people in the case of white mice and white rabbits; it occurs, however, occasionally, though not very frequently, in the human race, especially among the darker coloured varieties or sub-varieties of mankind.

The Isthmus of Darien and Africa have been mentioned as special localities for it. A human albino has the skin preternaturally fair. The hairs on his head and body are white. The pigmentum nigrum is deficient in the eyes, and these organs have a pinkish appearance, produced by the visibility of the blood in the choroid and iris; moreover, they are painful when exposed to light of even the ordinary intensity. āl-bū-mēn, āl-bū-mīn, s. [Lat., whence Fr. albumine, Port. albumina, Ital. albume.]

1. Chem.: The name of a class of Albuminoids (q.v.) that are soluble in water, as serum

(q.v.) and egg albumen. Egg albumen differs from serum by giving a precipitate when agitated with ether; it is scarcely soluble in strong nitric acid; its specific rotation is 35.50 for yellow light. The whites of eggs is composed of these substances; it dries up into a light yellow gum-like substance, which will not putrefy. It is converted into coagulated albumen by heating the fluid albumen to 72° C. It contains sulphur, and blackens a silver spoon. It is precipitated by strong acids. It is an antidote in cases of poisoning by corrosives sublimate or copper salts.

Coagulated albumen is obtained by heating neutral solutions of albumen, fibrin, &c., to boiling, or by the action of alcohol, also by heating precipitated albuminates or casein. It is insoluble in water, alcohol, and scarcely in dilute potash, but dissolves in acetic acid; by the action of caustic potash it is converted into albuminate. Pepsin and HCl (hydrochloric acid), at blood-heat, converts it into syntonin, and then into peptones.

Derived albumins are insoluble in water, and in solutions of NaCl (sodium chloride), but soluble in dilute acids and alkalies. There are acid albumins and alkali albumins.

Acid albumin is formed by adding a small quantity of dilute HCl (hydrochloric acid) to serum or egg albumen, and gradually raising the temperature to 70°; it does not coagulate, and the rotation to the left is increased to 72°. By neutralizing the liquid, a white flocculent precipitate is obtained insoluble in water, but soluble in alkali and in dilute solutions of alkaline carbonates.

Alkali albumin, or albuminate, is obtained by adding very dilute caustic alkali, heating the liquid, and precipitating with acids. It closely resembles the casein of milk. Potassium albuminate is also called protein.

2. Bot.: A substance interposed between the embryo and the testa of many plants. It is sometimes soft and fleshy, and at other times hard. It varies greatly in amount in those plants in which it is present, being particularly large in some endogens, such as the cocoa-nut, in which it constitutes the eatable part of the fruit. It is the perispermium of Jussieu, and the endospermium of Richard. [Lindley: Int. to Bot., 3rd ed., 1839, pp. 24, 249.]

3. Phot. Albumen Process: A process by which albumen is used instead of collodion to coat glass or paper. A method of doing this in the case of glass was published by M. Nièpce de Saint Victor in the Technologist for 1848. It was subsequently improved by M. le Gray. The foreign transparent stereoscopic views were at one time obtained by the use of albumen in the way now described.

āl-bū-mīn-ōids, s. pl. [Lat. albumen, genit. albuminis; Gr. είδος (eidos) = (1) form, (2) species, kind.] Proteids. (Ger. eiweisskörper.)

Chem.: A name given to certain chemical substances which occur in the animal and vegetable tissues. They are amorphous, and their chemical constitution has not yet been discovered. They contain about 54 parts of carbon, 7 of hydrogen, 16 of nitrogen, 21 of oxygen, and 1 to 1½ of sulphur. They are dissolved by acetic acid and strong mineral acids; nitric acid converts them into xanthoproteic acid; caustic alkalis decompose them, forming leucine, tyrosine, oxalic acid, and ammonia. They are divided into the following classes:—(1) ALBUMINS, soluble in water; as serum and egg albumen. (2) GLOBULINS, insoluble in water, soluble in very dilute acids and alkalies, soluble in a solution—ons per cent.—of NaCl (sodium chloride), as myosin, globulin, fibrinogen, vitellin. (3)

DERIVED ALBUMINS, insoluble in water and in solutions of NaCl (sodium chloride), soluble in dilute acids and alkalies; as acid albumin, alkali albumin, or albuminates, as casein. (4) FIBRIN, insoluble in water, sparingly soluble in dilute acids and alkalies, and in neutral saline solutions; as fibrin and gluten. (5) COAGULATED PROTEINS, soluble in gastric juice; as coagulated albumin. (6) AMYLOIDS, or Lardacein, insoluble in gastric juice. (See paper by Kekulé, Wanklyn, &c.; also Watts's Chem. Dict.)

āl-bū-mīn-ūr-ī-a, s. [Lat. albumen; urina = urine.]

Hermes Trimegistus is mentioned as one of the earliest alchemists, but the work on the subject attributed to him is spurious. Geber, an Arabian physician, who lived in the seventh century, is another early alchemist, but the genuineness of his works has been doubted. Raymond Lully, born in 1235; the illustrious Fyfar Bacon, born in 1214; Arnoldus de Villa Nova, born in 1240, were all known as alchemists. A number of similar inquirers arose in the fourteenth century: Basil Valentine is said to have lived in the fifteenth century, and with Paracelsus (1493-1541) the list may be said to close. The successors of the old alchemists may be grouped in two classes: inquirers into nature in a scientific manner, and impostors who professed or self-deceivers who hoped to find means to transmute the baser metals into gold.

A. Literally:

1. A study of nature with three special objects: (1) that of obtaining an alcahest, or universal solvent; (2) that of acquiring the ability to transmute all metals into gold or silver, especially the former; (3) that of obtaining an elixir vite, or universal medicine which might cure all diseases and indefinitely prolong human life. These objects were all desirable, and it could not be known a priori whether or not they were attainable. To take the transmutation of metals, the substances (some eventful or more) at present classed as simple elements may not always remain in that category; at any moment one may be found to be a compound of other substances, and require to be taken out of the list. The possibility of this becomes greater when it is remembered that not merely do allied metals generally occur in nature together, but there is also a definite relation between their atomic weights. The means adopted in the pre-scientific age, when alchemy most flourished [ALCHEMIST], were more open to ridicule than the objects aimed at. To achieve success in the study it was thought needful for one to obtain first the "philosopher's stone," described as a red powder with a peculiar smell. A skilled alchemist was called an "adept." In all ages scientific intellects are brought into being, and many "adepts" were the physical philosophers of the age. Though they failed in their immediate objects, they discovered the sulphuric, nitric, and muriatic acids, and laid the foundations of the noble science of modern chemistry. Others were pseudo-scientists and impostors who pretended that they really had made gold: by means of this latter type alchemy gradually sank in reputation, and ultimately became an object of ridicule to real scientific inquirers and to the civilised world at large.

"Astrology and alchemy became jests."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. III.

B. Organic Chem.: Alcohol is the name given to a class of compounds differing from hydrocarbons in the substitution of one or more hydrogen atoms by the monatomic radical hydroxyl (OH). Alcohols are divided into monatomic, diatomic, triatomic, &c., according as they contain 1, 2, or 3 atoms of H (hydrogen), each replaced by (OH). Alcohols may also be regarded as water in which one atom of H is replaced by a hydrocarbon radical. Alcohol can unite with certain salts, as alcohol of crystallization. The O in  $\begin{matrix} H \\ | \\ H \end{matrix} O$  (water) can be replaced by S (sulphur), as  $\begin{matrix} H \\ | \\ H \end{matrix} S$  (hydrogen sulphide); so in alcohol,  $\begin{matrix} C_2H_5 \\ | \\ H \end{matrix} O$ , forming mercaptan,  $\begin{matrix} C_2H_5 \\ | \\ H \end{matrix} S$ . Alcohol may also be compared with acids, as  $\begin{matrix} Cl \\ | \\ H \end{matrix} O$  (hypochlorous acid),  $\begin{matrix} C_2H_5 \\ | \\ H \end{matrix} O$  (alcohol); the H can be replaced by K or Na, as  $\begin{matrix} Cl \\ | \\ Na \end{matrix} O$  (sodium hypochlorite), and  $\begin{matrix} C_2H_5 \\ | \\ Na \end{matrix} O$  (sodium ethylate), therefore it can be considered as a weak acid. Also it can be compared with bases, as  $\begin{matrix} K \\ | \\ H \end{matrix} O$  (potassium hydrate) with acids forms salts and water. As  $KHO + HCl = KCl$  (potassium chloride) and  $H_2O$  (water), so alcohol and acids form acid ethers and water:  $\begin{matrix} C_2H_5 \\ | \\ H \end{matrix} O + Cl$  (hydrochloric acid) =  $H_2O$  and  $C_2H_5Cl$  (ethyl chloride). An alcohol is said to be primary, secondary, or tertiary, according as the carbon atom which is in combination with hydroxyl (OH) is likewise directly combined with one, two, or three carbon atoms. The hydrocarbon radicals can also have their carbon atoms linked together in different ways, forming isomeric alcohols. [AMYL ALCOHOL.] Primary alcohols, by the action of oxidizing agents, yield aldehydes, then acids; secondary alcohols, by oxidation, yield ketones; tertiary alcohols, by oxidation, yield a mixture of acids. Alcohols derived from benzol, or its substitution compounds, are called aromatic alcohols; they contain one or more benzol rings. [See BENZENE.]

ethyl alcohol (commonly called alcohol), ethylic alcohol, methyl carbino, spirits of wine, ethyl hydrate, s.,  $C_2H_6O = C_2H_5(OH) = \begin{matrix} CH_3 \\ | \\ CH_2 \end{matrix} (OH)$ .
Chem.: Pure ethyl alcohol, also called absolute alcohol, is obtained by distilling the strongest rectified spirit of wine with half its weight of quick-lime. Pure alcohol is a colourless limpid liquid, having a pungent agreeable odour and a burning taste. Its specific gravity at 0° is 0.8095, and at 15.5° is 0.7938, its vapour referred to air 1.813. It is very inflammable, burning with a pale blue smokeless flame. It boils at 78.4° when anhydrous. It becomes viscid at -100°. It mixes with water in all proportions, with evolution of heat and contraction of volume; and it readily absorbs moisture from the air, and from substances immersed in it. Chlorine converts alcohol into chloral,  $C_2H_3Cl_3O$ , but in the presence of alkalis into chloroform,  $CHCl_3$ . By oxidation alcohol is converted into aldehyde,  $C_2H_3O$ , then into acetic acid,  $C_2H_3O_2$ . The alkaline metals replace one atom of H, forming  $C_2H_5NaO$  (sodium ethylate). Strong  $H_2SO_4$  (sulphuric acid) forms with alcohol ( $C_2H_5$ ) $_2H_2SO_4$  sulphuric acid. HCl (hydrochloric acid) with alcohol yields ethyl chloride,  $C_2H_5Cl$ , and water. Alcohol can be formed by synthesis from the elements C, H, O: thus acetylene,  $C_2H_2$ , can be formed by passing an electric current in an atmosphere of H between carbon points; this is converted by nascent H into olefiant gas,  $C_2H_4$ , which is absorbed by  $H_2SO_4$  (sulphuric acid); by diluting with water, and distilling, alcohol is obtained. Alcohol is used as a solvent for alkaloids, resins, essential oils, several salts, &c. Alcohol is obtained by the fermentation of sugars, when a solution of them is mixed with yeast, Mycoderma cerevisia, and kept at a temperature between 25° and 80°, till it ceases to give off  $CO_2$  (carbonic acid gas). It is then distilled. Proof spirit contains 49.5 per cent. of alcohol, and has a specific gravity of 0.9198 at 60° F. Methylated spirit contains 10 per cent. of wood spirit in alcohol of sp. gr. 0.890; it is duty free, and can be used instead of spirits of wine for making chloroform, olefiant gas, varnishes, extracting alkaloids, and for preserving anatomical preparations, &c. Wines contain alcohol; port and sherry, 19 to 25 per cent.; claret and hock and strong ale, about 10 per cent.; brandy, whiskey, gin, &c., about 40 to 50 per cent. These liquids owe their intoxicating effects to the alcohol they contain.

I. Of recesses in sleeping apartments, vaults, or ordinary rooms:

1. A portion of a Spanish or other chamber, separated from the rest, with the view of its being used for the reception of a bed. The idea was borrowed from the ancients. In states bedchambers in Spain, the alcove was a flat form or estrade, raised a few inches above the floor, and as a rule, cut off from the rest of the chamber by a balustrade provided with doors.

"Deep in a rich alcove the prince was laid,
And slept beneath the pompous colonnade."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, bk. III., 516, 511.

3. A similar recess in a vault, designed to accommodate the coffin of the dead.

"The patriarch or parent of the tribe has the place of honour in the common cemetery, which is usually hewn out of the rock, sometimes into spacious chambers, supported by pillars, and with alcoves in the sides, where the coffins are deposited."—Milman: Hist. of Jews, 3rd ed., bk. garden for shelter from rain, for shade in bright sunlight, or other purpose.

¶ This is at present the most common signification of the word.

"The summit gain'd, behold the proud alcove
That crowns it; yet not all its pride secures
The grand retreat from injuries, impress'd
By rural carvers, who with knives deface
The panels, leaving an obscure, rude name,
In characters unorth, and spell amiss."

Spenser: F. Q. I., III. 14.

ál-dě-hý-des, s. [Contraction from Med. Lat. alcohol dehydrogenatus = alcohol deprived of hydrogen.]

Chem.: Aldehydeæ are formed by the oxidation of alcohols, and are re-converted into alcohols by the action of nascent hydrogen; by further oxidation they are converted into acids. They differ from alcohols in having two atoms less of hydrogen, which are removed from the carbon atom containing the radical HO' (hydroxy) connected to it in the alcohol; thus the aldehyde monatomic radical is (O=C—H)'. The carbon atom having two bonds united to an atom of oxygen, and another to an atom of hydrogen, the fourth is united to a monatomic hydrocarbon radical, or hydrogen. From monatomic alcohols only one aldehyde can be formed; from a diatomic alcohol there may be formed a diatomic aldehyde containing the radical (OCH') twice, or an alcohol aldehyde, or acid aldehyde: thus, glycol alcohol could yield

Many aldehydes of monatomic alcohols have been prepared by oxidation of the alcohols, or by distilling a mixture of the potassium salt of the corresponding acid with potassium formate, which yields potassium carbonate and the aldehyde. Aldehydes form crystalline compounds with acid sulphites; they also unite with aniline. Ketones are aldehydes in which the atom of hydrogen united to the radical (CO)' is replaced by a hydrocarbon radical.

Chemistry:  $\text{C}_2\text{H}_4\text{O} = \begin{array}{c} \text{CH}_3 \\ | \\ \text{HCO} \end{array}$  or  $\text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O.H}$ .

Aldehyde is a colourless, limpid, suffocating smelling liquid, boiling at 22°; it is soluble in alcohol, water, and ether; its sp. gr. is 0.8 at 0°. It is readily oxidized into acetic acid; when heated with caustic potash it forms a resin called aldehyde resin. Heated with  $\text{AgNO}_3$  (nitrate of silver), the silver is deposited as a bright mirror, and the liquid contains silver acetate. Nascent hydrogen converts it into alcohol. Chlorine converts it into  $\text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O.Cl}$  (acetyl chloride). When treated with H(CN) (hydrocyanic acid), it yields alanine,  $\text{C}_2\text{H}_7\text{NO}_2$  (amido-propionic acid). Aldehyde forms a crystalline compound with ammonia, called aldehyde ammonia,  $\text{C}_2\text{H}_4\text{O.NH}_3$ , which forms transparent colourless crystals; these melt at 76° and distil at 100°. Aldehyde forms a crystalline compound with  $\text{NaHSO}_3$  (acid sodium sulphite). It forms polymeric modifications, paraldehyde and metaaldehyde. It is prepared by the action of chlorine and weak alcohol, or by a mixture of  $\text{MnO}_2$  (binoxide of manganese) and  $\text{H}_2\text{SO}_4$  (sulphuric acid), or again by distilling a mixture of potassium acetate and formate. It unites with aniline to form dithidene-dianiline and water.

ál-dër-man, s. [Northumbrian aldorman; from A.S. ealdor = an elder; man = man; Ger. aldermann; Fris. alderman; generally supposed to be from alder (elder), and man, alder being the comparative of the Anglo-Saxon ald or eald. If so, then an alderman is so called from being, as a rule, well-up in years. But Dean Hoare thinks the term means not alderman, but of all the men chief, the alderman being the first in the council after the mayor. (ALDER, in composition.)

* 1. In Saxon times: A person possessed of an office of rank or dignity. The title Alderman of all England was applied to the first subject of the realm, and, as Rapiu informs us, corresponded to our Grand Justiciary. Other aldermen, or ealdermen, were governors of counties; hence the English word earl. (See Hoare, pp. 94, 95.) Even kings were so called, as, for instance, Cerdic, founder of the kingdom of Wessex, and his son Cymric. The office reached its highest dignity about the times of Ethelred and his son Edward.

3. One of the class of municipal officers ranking in dignity above the councillors, and below the mayor, in the burghs of England and Wales. In the corporation of London, which was not included in the Burgh Reform Act, the aldermen are elected for life. In England and Wales they are elected for six years, one half going out every three years. They are elected by the corporation, and are one-third part as numerous as the councillors. In Ireland they are elected by the distinguished citizens or burghesses. In Scotland the word alderman is not in use, the corresponding term there being baillie. Aldermen (and bailies) exercise magisterial functions like those discharged by justices of the peace.

al-gā-lōg, s. pl. [Lat. alga = a sea-weed.] [ALGA.]

Bot.: An alliance of plants, belonging to the class Thallogena, and consisting of Sea-weeds and their allies. The species are flowerless, without proper leaves, but the higher species have lobed fronds formed of uniform cellular tissue, and the sporules contained in these. The alliance contains five orders: Diatomaceæ, Confervaceæ, Fucaceæ (the typical one), Ceramiales, and Characeæ (q.v.). Another division given of them is into Melanospermeæ, or olive-spored; Rhodosperrmeæ, or rose-spored; and Chlorosperrmeæ, or green-spored. In 1827, Lindley estimated the known species at 1,094. The most highly-organised and typical of the Algae inhabit the ocean, their geographical distribution in it being marked, like that of plants on land; others occur in fresh water, and some on damp soil, rocks, walls, or glass.

Stood the great giant Algar,
Orion, hunter of the beast!"

¶ In using the expression "Occultation of Orion," Longfellow explains that he speaks not astronomically, but poetically. He is well aware that Orion cannot be occulted, but only the individual stars of which it is composed.

al-gē-brā, s. [In Sw., Dan., Dut., Ger.,

Sp., Port., and Ital. algebra; Fr. algèbre. Evidently from all from Arabic. Many etymologies from this language have been given. It was taken from the Arabic phrase, al-jabr & al-mokabalah = restoration and reduction (Penny Cyclo.). This view is essentially adopted by Wedgwood, who spells the phrase el-jabr wa el mokabala, and renders it = the putting together of parts, and equation.] What Sir Isaac Newton termed universal arithmetic. The department of mathematics which enables one, by the aid of certain symbols, to generalise, and therefore to abbreviate, the methods of solving questions relating to numbers. It was not till a late period that the Greeks became acquainted with algebra, the celebrated treatise of Diophantus not having appeared till the fourth century A.D. The science came into Western Europe through the Arabs, who probably derived it from the Hindoos. It conducts its operations by means of alphabetical letters standing for symbols of numbers, and connecting signs (+, -, &c.) representative of arithmetical processes. Of his letters, those near the commencement of the alphabet—a, b, c, d, &c.—generally stand for known quantities; and those towards its end—x, y, and z—for unknown ones. One of the most important operations in algebra is the solution of what are called equations—a beautiful and interesting process which, without tentative guesses of any kind, fairly reasons out the number or numbers for which one or more unknown quantities stand.

"The Greek Algebra was as nothing in comparison with the Greek Geometry; and the Hindu Geometry was as little worthy of comparison with the Hindu Algebra."—Calcutta Review, II. (1846), p. 540.

"Signification of Symbols in Double Algebra.—This particular mode of giving significance to symbolic algebra is named from its meanings requiring us to consider space of two dimensions (or area), whereas all that ordinary algebra requires can be represented in space of one dimension (or length). If the name be adopted, ordinary algebra must be called single."—De Morgan: Trigonomet. and Double Algebra (1849), c. v., p. 117.

The terms for apes and peacocks, like that of algum, and the corrupted form almug, are primarily of Sanscrit origin; and there can be no doubt that they were brought directly or circuitously from India, and seemingly from Malabar. If this failed, a pluries writ followed. [PLURIES.] (Blackstone's Comment., bk. iii., ch. 19; also Appendix, p. xv.; bk. iv., ch. 24.) It was abolished by 15 and 16 Vict., c. 76, § 10.

The children of aliens, if the former are born in Britain, are denizens. Formerly an alien could neither purchase nor inherit landed property, and in commercial matters he was taxed more heavily than natural-born subjects. (Blackstone's Comment., bk. iv., ch. 10.) Whilst the feudal law existed in full force, it was not permitted to any one to alienate his property without the consent of the superior lord. Ultimately, however, the right became established by successive steps, and one may now alienate an estate really his own by sale, gift, marriage settlement, devise, or other method. Anciently, a person alienating lands and tenements to another, contrary to law, as a punishment forfeited them altogether. This heavy penalty was specially enforced against the king's tenants in capite; most, if not all, private vassals escaped from it. Min. According to the British Museum Catalogue, a variety of Orthite; but Dana considers it a distinct species. He places it in his Epidote group of Unisilicates. It is monoclinic and isomorphous with epidote. Its crystals are sometimes tabular and flat, at others long and slender, or even acicular. The hardness is 5-6, the sp. grav. 3.0 to 4.2. It is generally of a pitch brown or black colour, with a sub-metallic pithy or resinous lustre. It is akin to epidote, and is a cerium epidote. It contains the other rare metals—lanthanum, didymium, yttrium, and sometimes glaucinum. Dana divides it into seven varieties: (1) Allanite proper, including Cerine, Bucklandite, and Tantalite; (2) Uralorthite, (3) Bagrationite, (4) Orthite, (5) Xanthorthite, (6) Pyrothite, and (7) Erdmannite. It is found in Greenland, Norway, and other places.

al-lán-tō-is, † al-lán-tō-íd, s. [In Fr. and Port. allantoide; from Gr. ἀλλαντοειδής (allantoeidēs) = shaped like an állas (allās), genit. ἄλλαντος (allantos) = a kind of meat, intermediate between our sausage and black-pudding.] A thin membrane existing in the embryos of amniotic vertebrata. It is situated under the chorion, and outside the amnion of the embryo. It is well developed in the Ruminantia, but less so in the Rodentia. In the chick of birds it becomes applied to the membrane of the egg-shell, and constitutes the breathing apparatus of the young animal till the lungs are formed. The embryo of man possesses an allantois, which, however, is but transient, shrivelling before the end of the second month of development, and soon afterwards entirely disappearing. This A.S. aleagan, imp. alege, is = (1) to place, to lay down, to lay along, (2) to lay aside, confine, diminish, take away, put down or depress. Generally taken from Lat. aliga = to bind; ad = to; ligo = to bind. But DuCange, whom Wedgwood follows, derives the above words from Low Lat. litus, lidus, ledus = a person intermediated between a freeman and a serf, and who owes certain services to his lord.] [LIEGE, LAD.]

I. The area or dominion within which the bond of obligation described under No. II. exists.

"Natural-born subjects are such as are born within the dominions of the crown of England; that is, within the ligeance, or, as it is generally called, the wilfulness of the king; and aliens, such as are born out of it."
[Blackstone: Comment., bk. I., ch. 10.]

II. The obligation itself.

I. The tie or ligamen which binds the subject to his liege lord the king, in return for the protection which the king allows the subject. It is founded on reason, and therefore affects all natural-born subjects of the king, that is, all born within his "ligeance." For a long time it was formally called universal and perpetual, to distinguish it from the local and temporary obligation contracted by aliens, whilst they remained in a country, to the ruler of that land in return for protection received. Recent legislation has, however, given up this principle, and a British settler in the United States, who has for ever left his country, is no longer entitled to claim the protection of our sovereign, or expected to render him or her allegiance in return.

"... yet he, that can endure to follow with allegiance a fallen lord, Does conquer him that did his master conquer, And earns a place i' the story."
[Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, III. II.]

"To which of these two princes did Christ mean owe allegiance?"
[Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.]

Local allegiance is such as is due from an alien, or stranger born, for so long time as he continues within the king's dominion and protection. [Blackstone: Comment., bk. I., ch. 10.]

Natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the king's dominions immediately upon their birth. [Blackstone: Comment., bk. I., ch. 10.]

Oath of allegiance: An oath binding one who takes it faithfully to discharge such obligation. For 600 years previous to the Revolution of 1688, this was of a sweeping character, but immediately after that great event it was modified, and made to run thus: "that he [the person swearing it] will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the king." It will be seen that no mention is here made of the king's heirs, and no effort is made to define the nature or extent of the "allegiance" to be rendered. Modifications of the oath of allegiance have since been made by 21 & 22 Vict., c. 48; superseded by 30 & 31 Vict., c. 75, § 5; and it again by the Promissory Oath Act, 31 & 32 Vict., c. 72, that now in force.

2. The infinite obligation due by every intelligent creature to the Creator.

I. A discourse designed to convey a different meaning from that which it directly expresses. A figure of speech or a literary composition in which a speaker or writer gives forth not the actual narrative, description, or whatever else he seeks to present, but one so much resembling it as on reflection to suggest it, and bring it home to the mind with greater force and effect than if it had been told directly. In many cases the description given appeals to the eye, whilst the truth designed to be conveyed is one of a moral or spiritual kind. As a quotation already made [ALLEGORIST] shows, Macaulay considered John Bunyan as unquestionably the first of allegorists; and every reader of the "Pilgrim's Progress" will at once understand both what an allegory is, and how effectual a vehicle it can be made for the communication of religious knowledge. Spenser's "Faerie Queene" is a moral allegory. A brief allegory may be considered as a single metaphor; a long one as a series of metaphors. The distinction between an allegory and a parable is very slight. Crabbe says that a parable is mostly employed for moral purposes, and an allegory in describing historical events. The latter differs from a riddle or enigma in not being intended to perplex. For the distinction between an allegory and a myth, see the unjoined example from Max Müller.

"The difference between a myth and an allegory has been simply but most happily explained by Professor Blackie in his article on Mythology in Chambers' Cyclopaedia. 'A myth is not to be confounded with an allegory; the one being an unconscious act of the popular mind at an early stage of society; the other, a conscious act of the individual mind at any stage of social progress.'
[Max Müller: Science of Language, (5th ed. 1871), vol. II., p. 430.]

"And thus it was: I writing of the way, And race of saints, in this our gospel day, Fell suddenly into an allegory About their journey, and the way to glory."
[Bunyan: Apology for Pilg. Prog.]

"But he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise. Which things are an allegory."
[Gal. IV. 23, 24.]

"In the passage from Galatians—the only place in the Authorized Version of the Bible in which the word allegory occurs—it is a mis-translation, and should disappear. The rendering should be: "Which things are allegorised."

al-lôx-án, s. [Eng. all(antoin) ox(alic), and suff. -an.]

Chem.: A substance obtained by the action of strong nitric acid on uric acid in the acid. Alloxan crystallises in large efflorescent rectangular prisms, C<sub>12</sub>H<sub>4</sub>N<sub>2</sub>O<sub>4</sub>.4H<sub>2</sub>O, which lose their water of crystallisation at 160°. Alloxan dissolves in water; the solution is acid and astringent, and stains the skin red; it gives a blue colour with a ferrous salt and an alkali, and white precipitate of oxaluramid with hydrocyanic acid and ammonia.

Chem.: C<sub>4</sub>H<sub>2</sub>N<sub>2</sub>O<sub>6</sub>. A bibasic acid obtained by adding baryta-water to a solution of alloxan heated to 60°, and decomposing the baryum salt by dilute sulphuric acid. Alloxanic acid crystallises in small radiated needles. Its silver salt is insoluble and anhydrous, and when its salts are boiled with water they are decomposed into urea and mesoxalates.

al-lôx-án-tin, s. [ALLOXAN.]

Chem.: C<sub>2</sub>N<sub>4</sub>H<sub>4</sub>O<sub>7</sub>.3H<sub>2</sub>O. A substance obtained by passing H<sub>2</sub>S through a strong cold solution of alloxan, when the alloxantin is precipitated along with sulphur; it dissolves in boiling water, and separates on cooling in the form of small four-sided, oblique, rhombic, colourless prisms. Its solution reddens litmus paper, gives a violet-coloured precipitate with baryta-water, which disappears on heating; it reduces silver salts. By chlorine or nitric acid it is oxidised to alloxan. It is converted into dialuric acid by passing H<sub>2</sub>S through a boiling solution of it. A hot saturated solution of alloxantin, mixed with a neutral salt of ammonia, turns purple, which disappears, uranin being deposited. When boiled with water and lead dioxide, alloxantin forms urea and lead carbonate. Its crystals, when heated to 150°, give off their water of crystallisation.

al-lôy, *al-láy, *a-láyo, s. [In Dut. alloo; Fr. alot (from loi = law), allage; Sp. liga; Port. liga; Ital. lega, legana = league, alloy. (See the verb.) Connected with Lat. ligo = to bind, and with lex = law; the proportion of any metals combined for the purpose of the coinage being regulated by law. (See Wedgwood, &c.).]

Alloy was formerly spelled ALLAY (q.v.).

- A. Ordinary Language:
  - I. Literally:
    1. The act of mixing a baser with a more precious metal for a legitimate purpose or for fraud. Used especially, though not exclusively, of the coinage. The general alloy of gold is from twenty-two to two per cent.; a pound of silver contains 11 oz. 2 dwt. of silver, and 18 dwt. of alloy. For jewellery there are the following legal standards: 18, 15, 12, and 9 carats. "The gold of hem hath now so badde alloyes With bras, that though the coven be fair at ye, It wolde rather burst in tuo than plye."—Chaucer: C. T., 9, 943-4.
    2. The baser metal so mixed with the one more precious.
  - II. Fig.: The act of mixing anything of lesser value, or of no value at all, with something precious. "It would be interesting to see how the pure gold of scientific truth found by the two philosophers was mingled by the two statesmen with just that quantity of alloy which was necessary for the working."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

* I. Formerly: The gravel, mud, sand, &c., deposited by water subsequently to the Noachian deluge. It was opposed to diluvium, supposed to be laid down by the deluge itself, or, in the opinion of others, by some great wave or series of waves originated by the sudden upheaval of large tracts of land or some other potent cause, different from the comparatively tranquil action of water which goes on day by day. [DILUVIUM.]

2. Now:

(a) "Earth or mud, gravels, stones, and other transported matter which have been washed away and thrown down by rivers, floods, or other causes upon land not permanently submerged beneath the waters of lakes or seas." (Lyell: Princip. of Geol., Glossary.) As generally used, the word is especially employed to designate the transported matter laid down by fresh water during the Pleistocene and recent periods. Thus it indicates partly a process of mechanical operation, and partly a date or period. It should not be forgotten that the former has gone on through all bygone geological ages, and has not been confined to any one time. Many of the hardest and most compact rocks were once loosely-colouring débris laid down by water. The most typical example of alluvium may be seen in the deltas of the Nile, Ganges, Mississippi, and many other rivers. Some rivers have alluviums of different ages on the slopes down into their valleys. The more modern of these belong to the recent period, as do the organic or other remains which they contain, while the older (as those of the Somme, Thames, Ouse, &c.), which are of Pleistocene age, enclose more or less rudely chipped flint implements, with the remains of mammals either local or everywhere extinct. [NEOLITHIC, PALÆOLITHIC, PLEISTOCENE, &c.] Though in many cases it is possible clearly to separate alluviums of different ages, yet the tendency of each new one is to tear up, re-distribute, and confound all its predecessors.

"Moreover, the last operations of water have a tendency to disturb and confound together all pre-existing alluviums."—Lyell: Elem. of Geol., ch. vii.
"As a general rule, the fluvialité alluvia of different ages . . ."—Ibid., ch. x.

(b) Volcanic alluvium: Sand, ashes, &c., which, after being emitted from a volcano, come under the action of water, and are by it re-deposited, as was the case with the materials which entered and filled the interior of houses at Pompeii. (Lyell: Elements of Geol., ch. xxv., index.)

(c) Marine alluvium: Alluvium produced by inundations of the sea, such as those which have from time to time overflowed the eastern coast of India. (Lyell: Princip. of Geol., ch. xvii.)

II. Law. The form of the word generally used in English law is alluvion, and in Scotch law alluvio. In both of these the enactment is, that if an "eyott," or little island, arise in a river midway between the two banks, it belongs in common to the proprietors on the opposite banks; but if it arise nearer one side, then it belongs to the proprietor whose lands it there adjoins. If a sudden inundation cut off part of a proprietor's land, or transfer the materials to that of another, he shall be recompensed by obtaining what the river has deposited in another place; but if the process be a gradual one, there is no redress. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. xvii.) ("Alluvio:" Index to Erskine's Instit. Scotch Law.)

Probably from al = the; manach = a calendar or diary: from mána, or manah = to compute; Heb.  $\text{מנח}$  (manah) = to distribute, to compute.

Wedgwood points out that in the Arab. of Syria almanakh is = climate or temperature. Others consider the word to be of Teutonic derivation. Thus Dean Hoare believes it Anglo-Saxon. He says that a square atack on which the Anglo-Saxons carved the course of the moon during the year, to fix the times of new and full moon and the festival days, was called by them almanaght = all-moon-head. (Hoare: Eng. Roots, 1855.) Other derivations, both Arabic and Teutonic, have been given.]

* 1. A kind of instrument, usually made of wood, inscribed with various figures and Runic characters, and representing the order of the feasts, the dominical letters, the days of the week, the golden number, and other matters. It was used by the old Scandinavian nations for the computation of time, civil and ecclesiastical. It might be made of leaves, connected like those of books, or of brass, or horn, or the skins of eels; or the information might be cut on daggers, or on tools of various kinds. Such productions were sometimes called rimstocks, or primestaffs, or runstocks, or runstiffs, or clogs. Remnants of them are still found in some English counties.

2. A small book primarily designed to furnish a calendar or table of the days belonging to the several months of the year for which it is constructed. It is known that an almanac was published by the Greeks of Alexandria about the second century A.D. Almanacs were produced by Solomon Jarchus, about 1150 A.D.; by Purbach, 1450—1461; and by Regiomontanus, between 1475 and 1506. In England, King James I. gave the monopoly of almanack-printing to the Universities and the Stationers' Company, but the former were no more than sleeping partners in the concern, and were, therefore, only partially disgraced by the extent to which astrological predictions were issued in their works. Not that the company, much less the universities, believed in these airy vaticinations; they only pandered to the credulity of the public, which would not till 1828 tolerate an almanack with these blots upon it omitted. In 1775 and 1779, mortal blows were struck at the monopoly of the Universities and the Stationers' Company, and the publication of almanacs is now free to all. An objectionable stamp duty of 1s. 8d. on each copy issued has also been swept away. Some modern almanacs, in addition to the calendar, contain an immense mass of astronomical, historical, political, and statistical information, all brought up to the latest date.

"Here comes the almanack of my true date.
What now?"—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, 1. 2.
"To watch the storms and hear the sky Oive all our almanacks the lie."
Cooper: Verena on a Flood at Olney.

¶ The Nautical Almanac is a work originated in the year 1767, by Dr. Maskelyne, the astronomer royal, and many years edited by him. It contains a summary of the lunar observations made at Greenwich Observatory, and by its aid the mariner observes the moon and adjacent stars with his sextant, and from comparison of his observations with the positions given in the Nautical Almanac computes his longitude, and ascertains the place of his vessel on the trackless ocean. This work contains about 600 pages of elaborate astronomical tables, constructed specially for the use of seamen in any part of the globe, but containing valuable information for the astronomer on land. Each month has twenty pages, containing full details of the phenomena of the sun and moon; then follow the ephemerides of the seven principal planets. After this comes a catalogue of the leading fixed stars, with their annual variations, followed by a list of the principal stars near which the moon passes in her monthly revolution through the heavens. The eclipses of the year are elaborately described. Then follows a list of stars to be occulted by the moon during each month. The eclipses of Jupiter's satellites, so useful in determining the longitude at sea, together with the configuration of the satellites on those occasions when the planet is visible, are successively detailed; besides other matters equally valuable to the mariner. This almanac has always been published three or four years in advance, in order that it may be sent to all parts of the world in time for the observation of the phenomena described in its pages.

"Mathematicians and almanac-makers are forced to eat their own prognosticks."—Gayton's Notes on Don Quixot, p. 268.

al-mānd-īte, al-mānd-īne, al-mānd-īn, al'-mōnd-īne, s. [From Lat. Alabandicus (Pliny) = pertaining to Alabanda, a city of Caria, where the mineral was cut and polished. Alabanda is said to have been called from Alabandus, its founder.] A mineral, a variety of garnet classed by Dana under the heading Iron-alumina garnet. Composition: Silica 36.1, alumina 20.6, protoxide of iron 43.3 = 100. Thus it is mainly a silicate of alumina and protoxide of iron. When it is of a deep red colour and transparent, it is called precious garnet; when brownish-red, or translucent, common garnet; when black, melanite. It is found in Ireland, Norway, Greenland, Hungary, Brazil, and other places.

ALMOND (AMYGDALUS COMMUNIS).

Leaves, Flowers, and Fruit.

A. Ordinary Language:

1. The fruit of the almond-tree. It is a slight ovate drupe, externally downy. There are two varieties of it, the one sweet and the other bitter. Sweet almonds are eaten. Taken in moderate amount they are nutritive and demulcent, but consumed in large quantities they are purgative. Bitter almonds contain prussic acid, and eaten in large quantities are poisonous. The distilled water containing their concentrated essence, if drunk, is almost instantly fatal. Brandy and ammonia may be given as an antidote.

"... spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds."—Gen. xliii. 11.
"Pound an almond, and the clear white colour will be altered into a dirty one, and the sweet taste into an oily one."—Locke.

2. The tree on which the fruit now described grows, the Amygdalus communis, of which there are two varieties, the A. communis, simply so termed, and the A. communis, var. amaræ, or bitter almond. The former has pink and the latter white flowers. They bloom very early in the season. The leaves are oblong-lanceolate, with serrated margins. Both varieties of almond are cultivated in this country, the sweet one being the more common. They seem to have come originally from Persia, Asia Minor, Syria, and the north of Africa. [AMYGDALUS.]

"Many varieties of the almond are cultivated, differing in the nature of their fruits."—Treat. of Botany.

B. Technically:

1. Among lapidaries: Pieces of rock crystal used in adorning branch candlesticks.

II. Anatomy:

1. Almonds of the throat, or tonsils: Two round glands placed at the basis of the tongue on either side. Each has a large oval sinus opening into the fauces. This, with a number of smaller sinuses inside it, discharge a mucous substance designed to moisten and lubricate the fauces, larynx, and œsophagus.

2. Almonds of the ears: An inaccurate name sometimes given to the almonds of the throat, or tonsils.

"The tonsils, or almonds of the ears, are also frequently swelled in the king's evil; which tumour may be very well reckoned a species of it."—Wiseman: Surg.

al'-mōn-ēr, *alm-nēr (l silent), s. [Fr. aumonier.] A person whose office it is to distribute alms. It was first given to such a functionary in a religious house, there being an ancient canon which specially enjoined each monastery to spend a tenth part of its income in alms to the poor. By an ancient canon also, all bishops were required to keep almoners. Kings, queens, princes, and other people of rank, had similar functionaries.

"... the chaplain and almoner of the queen dowager."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

¶ The Lord Almoner, or Lord High Almoner of England, is a functionary charged with the duty of distributing the royal alms. Amid other resources for doing this were the forfeited goods of a felo de se; but by the Act 83 & 84 Vict., c. 23, these are not now taken from the beira. The Archbishops of York long acted as Lord High Almoners of England. Now there is an "Hereditary Grand Almoner" (the Marquis of Exeter), and under him a Lord High Almoner and a sub-almoner, both ecclesiastics. [MAUNDY.]

al'-môu-rý, * alm'-rý, * alm'-er-ý (I silent), * áwm'e-brý, * áwm'-er-ý, s. [Fr. aumonerie; Ital. elemosinaria.]

† 2. As adjective: Well nigh; all but.

"... between the first rudiments of an art, and its almost perfection."—Goldsmith: Politic Learning.

alm, * almes (I silent), * al'-mëss, * al'-mësse, * al'-môs, * ál'-mësse, s. [A. S. almesse, almasse, almisse, almes. In Sw. almosor; Dan. almisser; Dut. almoes; Ger. almosen; Fr. aumône; Norm. Fr. almoynes; Sp. limosna; Port. esmola; Ital. limosina; Low Lat. elemosyna; Gr. ἐλεμοσύνη (elémousinê) = (1) pity, mercy, (2) charity, alms; ἐλεῖν (eleo) = to have pity; ἐλεος (eleos) = pity. Thus alm in English, when traced to its origin, is really the Greek word ἐλεμοσύνη (elémousinê) corrupted; and the fact that so long a Greek word should have been worn away into so short an English one, is fitted to suggest that in these islands during the Middle Ages it can scarcely ever have been out of people's lips. The Continental nations, it will be observed, have not yet succeeded in reducing the six Greek syllables into less than three or two; and we have cut it away into a monosyllable, not susceptible of much further reduction. There must have been among our ancestors much charity or much mendicancy, or much of both one and the other.]

A. Ordinary Language: Money, food, clothing, or anything else given as a gratuity to relieve the poor. [OBLATION.]

† The s of the word alm is not the sign of the plural; it is the σ (s) of the Greek word. Alms is now, however, often used as a plural.

"... when a freeman by kn or burthe is constrained by povert to eten the almes of his enemyes."—Chaucer: Tale of Melibius.

"His bond mynstrer of freedom and almese."—Chaucer: C. T., 4, 588.

(b) Tenure by free alms, or frank almoyne: Tenure of property which is liable to no rent or service. Many of the old monasteries and religious houses in Britain obtained lands in this way, which were free from all rent or service.

The cut-leaves of the plant are put into a tub, the juice collected from them, and either boiled to a proper consistence or exposed to the sun till the fluid part evaporates. There are four principal kinds, two official. (1) Barbadoes Aloe (Aloe Barbadosensis), formed from the juice of the cut-leaf of Aloe vulgaris. It is imported in gourds, and has a dull yellowish-brown opaque colour, breaks with a dull conchoidal fracture, shows crystals under the microscope, has a nauseous odour, and is soluble in proof spirit. (2) Socotrina Aloes (Aloe Socotrina), the produce of several species of aloes; it occurs in reddish-brown masses, and breaks with a vitreous fracture. Its powder is a bright orange colour. It has a fruity smell. It comes from Bombay. (3) Hepatic Aloes, or East India Aloes non-official, is liver-coloured; its powder is yellow. (4) Cape Aloes, the produce of Aloe spicata and other non-official species, is a greenish-brown colour; this is given to horses. An inferior variety is called Caballine Aloes. Aloes acts as a purgative, affecting chiefly the lower part of the intestinal canal. It increases the flow of the bile; it often produces griping when given alone, and sometimes causes hæmorrhoids. The watery extract of aloes is free from these objectionable properties. Cape Aloes is less purgative. The use of aloes is not followed by constipation. Aloes has a very bitter taste.

"Alone, alone, all, all alone, Alone on the wild, wild sea."—Coleridge: Ancient Mariner.

¶ Blair objected to this adverbial use of the word. He thus discriminates between only and alone: "Only imports that there is no other of the same kind; alone imports being accompanied by no other. An only child is one which has neither brother nor sister; a child alone is one which is left by itself. There is a difference, therefore, in precise language betwixt these two phrases, 'Virtue only makes us happy,' and 'Virtue alone makes us happy.' Virtue only makes us happy, imports that nothing else can do it; virtue alone makes us happy, imports that virtue, by itself, or unaccompanied with other advantages, is sufficient to do it." (Blair: Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, 1817, vol. i., p. 230.)

B. Technically:
1. Astron.: Alpha (α) and the other Greek letters are used to catalogue the stars in the several constellations, even though some of them may have Arabic or other distinctive names. Alpha (α) stands for the brightest star. It is still retained in modern star-maps and catalogues.

ál'-pha-bét, s. [In Dut., Ger., & Fr. alphabet; Sw. and Dan. alfabet; Sp. and Ital. alfabeto; Port. alfabeto; Later Lat. of Tertullian (about 195 A.D.) and of Jerome (about the end of the fourth century) alphabetum; Gr. of Epiphanius (about 320 A.D.) ἀλφάβητος (alphabētos), from Gr. ἄλφα (alpha) = the first, and βήτα (beta), the second letter of the Greek alphabet.] A table or list of characters which stand as the signs of particular sounds. Koppe in 1819, and Gesenius in 1837, with much probability, traced back most of the chief Syro-Arabian alphabets, and nearly all those current in Europe, to the ancient Phœnician one. The latter investigator constructed an elaborate table of their complex affinities. The square Hebrew now used in printing figures in this table as a descendant of the old Aramæan, modified by the influence of the Palmyrene letters. The old Greek characters are a primary offshoot from the earliest Phœnician, and the Roman letters are modifications of the Greek alphabet. Perhaps the old Phœnician alphabet itself may have been altered from the Egyptian hieroglyphics, and they again from picture writing like that by means of which the ancient Mexicans on the coast sent to their government an intimation that white men (Spaniards) had landed in their country. [HIEROGLYPHICS.] Other families or groups of alphabets exist besides those now indicated. The cuneiform letters of Babylon, Assyria, Persia, &c., are not closely akin to these now described, and appear independent. [ARROW-HEADED, CUNEIFORM.] The alphabets of all the modern languages of India have apparently been derived from one common character—the Devanagari. Inscriptions in caves, on seals, &c., show an older form of this than that to which one is accustomed in ordinary Sanscrit books. It does not seem to have sprung from the Phœnician. [DEVANAGARI.] Similarly independent of the latter tongue and of each other are the Chinese characters, the Mexican or Aztec alphabet, and that of Yucatan. Other groups may yet be discovered, and some of those already known may be affiliated together. It will be observed that any division of mankind formed on similarity or dissimilarity of their alphabets would be of an artificial kind: it is mainly on philology, physiology, and history that a late, fát, fáre, amidst, whát, fáll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camél, hēr, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, maríne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; míte, cúb, cüre, únite, cür, rúle, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = á. qu = kw.

From Lat. altor or altare = an altar, especially one higher and more splendidly adorned than an ara. From altus = high.]

A. Literally: An erection made for the offering of sacrifices for memorial purposes, or for some other object.

1. In Patriarchal times. An altar designed for sacrifice is mentioned in Scripture as early as the time of Noah (Gen. viii. 20). Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob built several altars in places where for a brief or more lengthened period they sojourned. Most of these appear to have been for sacrificial purposes, and one or two seem to have been for memorial ends; but the most unequivocal case of the memorial altar was subsequently. (Josh. xxii. 10—34; Gen. xii. 7, 8; xiii. 4, 18; xxii. 9; xxvi. 25; xxxiii. 20; xxxv. 1, 7.)

2. In Jewish times. At Sinai directions were given that altars should be of earth or of stone unhewn, and that the ascent to them should not be by steps (Exod. xx. 24—26). When the tabernacle worship was established, there was an altar of wood covered with brass, designed for sacrifice, and one overlaid with gold, on which incense was burnt (Exod. xxvii. 1—8; xxxi. 1—10). Both had projections at the four corners of the upper surface. To those of the brazen altar victims were bound, and a fugitive from death seizing hold of one of these could not legally be dragged away to meet his doom. Strictly speaking, all sacrifices were to be confined to the one sacrificial altar, but the injunction was observed only to a partial extent. (1 Sam. vii. 17; 2 Sam. xxiv. 25; 1 Kings xviii. 32.)

3. In Christian times:

(a) In the early Christian centuries altars were generally of wood. During the sixth century stone was employed in the construction, and this continued to the time of the Reformation.

(b) In the Church of Rome an altar is essential, it being believed that in the mass an actual though unbloody sacrifice is offered for sin. Formerly, also, there was an upper altar (superaltare), which was a small portable one for the consecration of the communion elements, when the priest had not the opportunity of using the altar in a church or chapel.

(c) In the Church of England. The stone altars which were in the churches when the Reformation began [see (a)] were removed about the year 1550, and tables substituted for them. Queen Mary restored the altars, which were, however, again removed on the accession of Queen Elizabeth. What is sometimes called "the altar" is everywhere in the Prayer Book called "the holy table."

4. Among the old ethnic and modern non-Christian nations. Many of the old ethnic nations built altars for idolatrous worship on the tops of hills or in groves. The Greeks and Romans built high altars to the heavenly gods, and some of lower elevation to the demigods and heroes, whilst they worshipped the infernal gods in trenches scooped out of the ground. Many nations have had, and yet possess, altars of turf, stone, wood, or, in rare cases, even of horn; but they are wholly absent among the Mohammedans.

B. More or less figuratively:

1. Used of Christ, by the figure of speech called metonymy, by which the altar is substituted for the peculiar victim offered upon it in sacrifice. (Heb. xiii. 10.)

2. The most sacred spot or most sacred service of religion, truth, or sought else to which complete consecration of the powers is due. (Pope: Homer; Iliad v. 592.)

3. The hymeneal altar, or simply the altar: The altar in a church before which a marriage is solemnized. (HYMENEAL.)

"In many countries it is necessary to tarry long in the vestibule of the temple before advancing to the altar, under the title of affluences."—Bowring: Bentham's Principle of the Civil Code. (Works, vol. 1, 650.)

To lead to the hymeneal altar: (Lit.): Used, properly, of a bridegroom, who, after the first portion of the marriage service has been performed in the body of the church, goes with his bride to the communion table, for the conclusion of the service as directed in the rubric. (Book of Common Prayer.)

† Loosely and incorrectly = to marry.

2. In space: In reciprocal succession; first on one side, and then on the other. (See B. 1.)

B. Technically: 1. Bot. Alternste pinnate: A term used of a pinnate leaf which has the leaflets alternate on a common petiole. Example: Potentilla rupestris, Tolufera balsamum.

ALTERNATELY PINNATE LEAVES. (TOLUFERA BALSAMUM.)

2. Geom. or Alg.: If there be four magnitudes or quantities in proportion, of which the first is to the second as the third to the fourth, then either of the expressions permuto (by permutation) or alternando (alternately) is employed, when it is inferred that the first proportional has the same ratio to the third that the second has to the fourth, or that the first is to the third as the second is to the fourth.

Thus if AB : CD :: MN : PQ, then these proportionals are placed alternste; if they stand thus—

CD : AB :: PQ : MN, OR AB : MN :: CD : PQ.

So also if a : b :: c : d, then these symbols are placed alternste if they are written b : a :: d : c, and a : c :: b : d. (See Euclid, Bk. V., Def. 13, Prop. 16.)

† ál-tér-n-ate-ness, a. [Eng. alternste; -ness.] The same as ALTERNATION (q. v.).

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Gen.: The succession of things to one another in a reciprocal order; interchange of things oftenener than once with others, in time or in space.

"Slow alternations of land and sea."—Owen: Classif. of the Mammalia, p. 65.

(b) In space: "Each successive tide brings its charge of mixed powder, deposits its duplex layer day after day, and finally masses of immense thickness are piled up, which, by preserving the alternations of sand and mica, tell the tale of their formation."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science, 3rd ed., p. 408.

2. Alternate performances between the two divisions of a choir.

B. Technically:

1. Biol. or Zool. Alternation of Generations: The rendering of a scientific term used by Prof. Steenstrup to express an abnormal kind of generation, called by Prof. Owen Metagenesis. It implies that one kind of birth takes place in one generation, and another in the next; the third is again like the first, and the fourth resembles the second. In the first generation there is the ordinary propagation of the race by impregnation; in the second, immature animals, which appear as if they had not passed beyond the larval state, give birth to young. This feature in the case Prof. Owen calls Parthenogenesis (q. v.). By the curious arrangement now mentioned, the young do not resemble their immediate parents, but their grand-parents; as in due time what may be termed their grandchildren will resemble them. The best known instance of alternation ból, hóy; pout, jówl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -íng -tion, -sion, -cioun = shün; -flon, -flon = zhün. -tious, -sious, -cious, -ceous = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, del

1. Chem.: The name given to double salts of sulphate of aluminium with sulphates of potassium, sodium, ammonium, or of other monatomic metals, as silver, thallium, cesium, rubidium. They crystallise in octohedra. Potash alum,  $Al_2K_2(SO_4)_4 + 24H_2O$ , is prepared by the decomposition of a shale containing iron pyrites,  $FeS_2$ , which is gently burnt and exposed to the air in a moist state; it oxidises and forms sulphates, and, on the addition of a potash salt to the solution obtained by water, alum crystallises out. Alum has a sweet astringent taste, reddens litmus paper, and dissolves in its own weight of boiling water. Sodium alum is very soluble. Ammonium alum is often prepared by adding the ammonia liquor of gas-works instead of potash. Alum is used in dyeing and in preparing skins, &c. Alums can be also formed in which ferric or chromic sulphates replace aluminium sulphate, as potassio-ferric sulphate,  $Fe_2K_2(SO_4)_4 + 24H_2O$ , and ammonio-chromic sulphate,  $Cr_2(NH_4)_2(SO_4)_4 + 24H_2O$ . These crystallise in the same form, and cannot be separated from each other by crystallisation. Alum is used in medicine as an astringent in doses of ten to twenty grains. Burnt slum is alum deprived of its water of crystallisation by heat; it is used externally as a slight escharotic.

"... and oyle of tartre, alym, glas, bern, wort, and argoyle." Chaucer: C. T., 13,740, 12,741.

* alum-earth, or poleura, s. Names formerly given to a fibrous mineral of a silky lustre, brought by Dr. Gillies from the Chilean Andes. It was said to be used by the inhabitants as a mordant in dyeing red. Urs describes slum-earth as an impure earthy variety of lignite. Both alum-earth and poleura seem to have disappeared from the most modern works on mineralogy.

1. The English name of the Geranium maculatum. Its root contains a great deal of tannin, and is powerfully astringent. Bigelow recommends it in diseases which on their removal leave idleness behind. The tincture may be locally applied with much advantage in sore throats and ulcerations of the mouth. (Lindley: Veg. Kingd.)

ál'-ü-mín-a, † ál'-ü-míne, s. [In Fr. alumine; from Lat. alumina, pl. of alumen = alum.]

1. Chem.: The only oxide of aluminium known. Its sp. gr. is 3.9. It is isomorphic with ferric and chromic oxides. It occurs native in crystals, as corundum, ruby, sapphire, and less pure as emery. It is the hardest substance known except the diamond. It can be obtained by precipitating a salt of aluminium by ammonia and igniting the precipitate. It is nearly insoluble in most acids. It is a white, insoluble, tasteless, amorphous powder. Three hydrates are known,  $Al_2O_3 \cdot H_2O$ ,  $Al_2O_3 \cdot 2H_2O$ , and  $Al_2O_3 \cdot 3H_2O$ ; the trihydrate is the ordinary gelatinous precipitate. It is soluble in acids and fixed alkalis. It is a weak base, many of its salts having an acid reaction. It is largely used in dyeing as a mordant. It forms insoluble compounds with vegetable colours called lakes. It occurs native as Gibbsite. The monohydrate is Diaspore. The dihydrate cannot act as a mordant; it is soluble in acetic acid. (See Watts's Dict. Chem.) Silicates of aluminium forms the basis of clays.

2. Mineralogy. Aluminium, sometimes called argil, or the argillaceous earth, is the basis of all clays, and imparts to them the plastic character for which they are distinguished. For the aspects which it presents when it occurs native, see No. 1. It enters into the composition of many minerals, the proportion in which it occurs being generally stated just after that of the silica; thus, garnet taken from the Ural Mountains has silica 36.86, and alumina 24.19.

Found in the Harz mountains, in Germany, and in Sussex, in England, &c.

āl-ūm-in-ī-ūm, s. [In Ger. & Dut. aluminium. From Lat. alumen = alum.]

Chem.: A tetratomic metal; symbol Al; atomic weight 27.4; sp. gr. 2.6; melts at red heat. It is a white, sonorous, ductile, malleable metal, not oxidised in the air, nearly insoluble in dilute sulphuric or nitric acid, readily soluble in HCl, and in solutions of potash or soda with evolution of H<sub>2</sub>. It is used for instruments and ornaments; it forms a valuable alloy with copper, resembling gold, and not easily tarnished, called aluminium bronze. It is prepared by decomposing the double chloride of aluminium and sodium by metallic sodium. It forms one oxide, alumina, Al<sub>2</sub>O<sub>3</sub> (q.v.). Its most important salts are alums (q.v.) and aluminium chloride, Al<sub>2</sub>Cl<sub>6</sub>, which is formed when aluminium hydrate is dissolved in HCl, but upon evaporation HCl escapes and leaves Al<sub>2</sub>O<sub>3</sub>. It can be obtained by pouring Cl over a mixture of Al<sub>2</sub>O<sub>3</sub> and carbon heated to redness. It is a transparent waxy substance, boiling at 180°. It forms double salts with alkaline chlorides, as Al<sub>2</sub>Cl<sub>6</sub>.2NaCl. Aluminium fluoride, Al<sub>2</sub>F<sub>6</sub>, also forms double salts, aluminium and sodium. Fluoride, Al<sub>2</sub>F<sub>6</sub>.6NaF, occurs as the mineral cryolite in Greenland. Numerous silicates of aluminium occur as minerals (see CLAYS, FELSPAR, &c.). The salts of aluminium are recognised by giving a blue colour when moistened with nitrate of cobalt, and heated before the blow-pipe. Alumina is precipitated from its solutions by caustic alkalis as a white precipitate, soluble in excess; ammonia gives a similar precipitate, insoluble in excess; alkaline carbonates precipitate the hydrate, and CO<sub>2</sub> escapes; ammonia sulphide gives a white precipitate of aluminium hydrate. The salts of aluminium belong to the same class as the ferric and chromic salts; oxides of aluminium, chromium, and sesquioxide of iron are precipitated with ammonia. [ANALYSIS.] The alumina and phosphate of aluminium are dissolved by boiling with caustic potash; phosphate of aluminium is distinguished by being insoluble in acetic acid.

[ALUMINILITE.] A mineral classed by Dana under his "Oxygen Compounds—Hydrous Silicates." It consists of about 35.50 of sulphuric acid, 59.65 of alumina, about 10 of potash, and 15 of water. It crystallizes in obtuse rhomboids, variously modified. It is white, greyish, or reddish. It varies from transparent to sub-transparent. Dana makes five varieties: (a) Crystallised; (b) Fibrous concretionary; (c) Massive and moderately tender; (d) Hard, mainly from disseminated silica; (e) Cavernous. It forms seams in trachytic and andesitic rocks, being produced by the action on them of sulphurous vapours. It occurs in Italy, Hungary, and France. Roman alum is prepared from this mineral. It is almost free from iron.

āl-ūn-ō-gēn, s. [Fr. alun = alum, and général (genéral) = to engender.] The name of a mineral; according to the British Museum Catalogue, the same as Keramohalite; but of the two names Dana prefers alunogen. It is white, tinged with yellow or red, has a vitreous lustre, is sub-transparent or transparent, and tastes like alum. It is a sulphate of alumina, containing about 36.40 of sulphuric acid, 16 of alumina, and 46 of water. It is found near Bogota, and also in the vicinity of Königsberg.

On this she burnt three of the nine volumes in his presence, and asked the original price for the remaining six. Meeting with a second refusal, she proceeded to burn three more, and asked the full price for the remaining three. Awed by her extraordinary conduct, the king at last purchased the three for the sum originally asked for the nine. [SIBYL.]

From "amanos (Amanos), a mountain in Cilicia, where many fungi grew.] A sub-genus of Agaricus, the typical genus of the alliance Fungales, and the order Agaricaceæ. The A. muscaria is ordinarily poisonous, so much so that the name muscaria (from musca = a fly) is designed to imply that the Amanita steeped in milk kills the flies which partake of the liquid thus poisoned. Yet, so much does the quality of a fungus depend on climate and place of growth, that, if Langsdorf is accurate, the A. muscaria in Kamschatka and other portions of North-eastern Asia, is not poisonous, but only intoxicating. (Lindley: Veg. Kingd., p. 38.)

ä-mär-än-tä-cë-ö, ä-mär-änth-ä-cë-ö, s. pl. [AMARANTHUS.] Amaranths. A natural order of plants, consisting of "Chenopodal exogens, with separata sepals opposite the stamens, usually one-celled anthers, a single ovary often containing several seeds, and scarious flowers buried in imbricated bracts." The order is divided into three sub-orders—Gomphreneæ, Achyrantheæ, and Celoseæ. The species are generally unattractive weeds, but sometimes they are of more showy appearance. In 1846, Lindley estimated the number of species at 282; now, it is believed, about 500 are known. They occur chiefly in the tropics of America and Asia; a number also are Australian. None are truly wild in Britain; but the Cockscorn, the Globe Amaranth, the Prince's Feather, and Love-lies-bleeding, are found in gardens. Many Amaranthaceæ are used as potherbs. Amaranthus obtusifolius is said to be diuretic; Gomphrena officinalis and macrocephala have a high reputation in Brazil as remedies in intermittent fever, diarrhoea, colic, and snake-bite.

Blitum*, or Wild Amaranth, has here and there escaped from English gardens. A. melancholicus and tricolor are tender annuals, and A. sanguineus and caudatus common border flowers. The leaves of A. viridis are employed externally as an emollient poultice. A. obtusifolius is said to be diuretic. A. debilis is used in Madagascar as a cure for syphilis. The seeds of A. frumentaceus and A. Anardhana are used as corn in India. (Lindley: Veg. Kingd.)

ām-ar-yl-lī-dā-čě-ə, s. pl. [AMARYLLIS.] Amaryllids. An order of plants placed by Lindley in the Narcissal alliance of the class Endogens. In their six-partite or six-cleft coloured perianth, and their three-celled fruit, they resemble Lily-worts, from which, however, they are at once distinguished by their inferior ovary. In 1846 Lindley estimated the known species at four hundred. The representatives of the order in the British flora are Narcissus, Galanthus, and Leucojum. Beautiful as they are, most of them have poisonous bulbs. The Tottentots are said to dip the heads of their arrows in the viscid juice of the bulb of Hemanthus toxicarius and some allied species. Several are emetic, having a principle in their composition like that of the squill. Oporanthus luteus is purgative, Alströméria salicilla diaphoretic and diuretic, and Amaryllis ornata astringent. A kind of arrowroot is prepared in Chili from Alströméria pallida and other species. The wine called pulque is made from the wild Agave of Mexico.

ām-āu-rō-sis, s. [In Fr. amaurose; Gr. ἀμαυρόσις (amaurosis) = to make dark; ἀμαυρός (amauros) = dim, faint.] A disease of the eye arising from impaired sensibility of the retina. It is held to exist when a patient without opaque cornea, closed pupil, or cataract, complains of lost or defective vision. It commences with confused vision; then there is the appearance of a black spot in the centre of an object looked at; next, floating bodies called muscæ volitantes appear before the eye, or objects appear brighter than natural. In the commencement of the disease the pupil dilates and contracts sluggishly; after a time it becomes more dilated and fixed; and at last there is established a state of complete blindness, constituting the true gutta serena. Amaurosis arises from inflammation or turgescence of the retina, from derangement of the digestive organs, from exercise of the eye on minute objects, and from injury or disease of the fifth nerve or its branches, or from injury of the eye itself. (Dr. Arthur Jacob, Art. "Amaurosis," Cyclop. Pract. Med.)

II. Specially:

1. Lit.: A minister of high rank sent on an embassy to represent nonially his sovereign, but really his country, at the court of another monarch, or at the capital of a republic. Sir Henry Wotton's definition of an ambassador as "an honest man sent to lie abroad for the commonwealth," however correctly it may have described the older school of diplomatista, is now, it is fondly trusted, quite out of date. (Walton: Letter to Velserus, A.D. 1612.) Ambassadors are of two kinds: extraordinary, employed on special missions; and ordinary, who reside permanently at the seat of government to which they are accredited. All the ancient ambassadors were of the former class. In every civilized nation the person of an ambassador is sacred, his mansion also is inviolable, and his retinue subject to no local jurisdiction but his own. An envoy is an inferior kind of ambassador dispatched on a special mission. A resident, or chargé d'affaires, is also of less dignity than a proper ambassador. Many such residents exist in India, and represent the Anglo-Indian Government at the courts of the several native rajahs. Consuls are again of inferior rank to residents, and are specially charged to protect and promote the commercial enterprise of their country in the place where they are stationed.

"Howbeit in the business of the ambassadors of the princes of Babylon who invited him to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land . . ."—3 Chron. xxxii. 81.

A. As substantive:

I. The genuine amber.

1. As a mineral. It is called also Succinite, from Lat. succinum = amber. [SUCCINITE.] Its colour is generally yellow, but sometimes reddish, brownish, or whitish and clouded. It is resinous in lustre, always translucent, and sometimes transparent. It is brittle, and yields easily to the knife. It fuses at 287° C. It is combustible, burning readily with a yellow flame, and emitting an agreeable odour. It is also highly electrical, so much so that electricity is derived from the Greek word ἤλεκτρον (ēlektron), or ἤλεκτρος (ēlektrōs) = amber. Composition: Carbon, 78.94; hydrogen, 10.53; oxygen, 10.53 = 100. Found occasionally in masses as large as a man's head; but at other times in smaller pieces, some no larger than a grain of coarse sand. Occurs along the Prussian coast of the Baltic, between Dantzig and Memel, as well as in various other parts of the Continent; in Middlesex, near London; in Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk and York; and finally in Asia and America. It is valued as a gem.

"... whose sisters, metamorphosed into poplar-trees, shed tears at his death, which were hardened into amber."—Livy: Aetion, of the Ambrones, ch. 1, § 2. "Pomeranian amber was set in Lydian gold to adorn the necks of queens."—Maass: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

2. As a geological product. Pliny was correct when he considered it to be an exudation from trees of the Pine family, like gum from the cherry, and resin from the ordinary pine. Prof. Göppert, of Breslau, in 1845, deemed it a resinous exudation from an extinct pine, Pinus succinifer, most nearly allied to P. abies (Abies excelsa, the Norway Spruce) or P. picea (Abies picea, the Silver Fir). He believed that forests of this tree once grew in the south-eastern part of what is now the bed of the Baltic in about 55° north latitude, and 37-38° east longitude; but that during the time of the drift they were swept away, and the amber carried south and west-west to Pomerania and the adjacent regions, where now it is found. Subsequently he discovered that amber had been formed not by the P. succinifer only, but by eight other allied species, if, indeed, all the Abietinae and Cupressinae of the time and place did not share in its production. In 1845 he thought it of the age of the Molasse (Miocene ?), in 1854 he deemed it Pliocene, and perhaps of the drift formation (Upper Pliocene = pleistocene); but its exact age is as yet undetermined. Of 163 species of plants found in it, thirty still exist. 800 species of insects have also been met with in it, with remains of animals of other classes. [Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc., vol. II. (1846), l. 102; vol. x. (1854), ii. 1.]

II. The amber of Scripture.

¶ In Scripture the word "amber," חַשְׁמַל (chashmal) (Ezek. i. 4, 27; viii. 2), is not what is now called by the name, but a mixed metal. It may be polished brass, or brass and gold, or silver and gold; it is difficult to say which. "And I saw as the colour of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it."—Ezek. i. 27.

"The Lords agreed to the bill without amendments: and the King gave his assent."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

3. Public Meetings: A proposed alteration on the terms of a motion laid before a meeting for acceptance. This "amendment" may be so much at variance with the essential

A-mēr'-ī-can, a. & s. [Eng. America; -an. In Ger. Amerikanisch, adj., Americaner, s.; Fr. Americain, adj. & s.; Sp., Port., & Ital. Americano. From America, the name applied to two great continents of the globe, called—with little regard to justice—after a Florentine, Amerigo Vespucci; though the great pioneer who had opened the way for him and other explorers had been the immortal Christopher Columbus. Columbus is popularly called the discoverer of America; but it appears established on good evidence, that about four centuries before he, on the memorable 12th of October, 1492, landed on Guanahani, or "San Salvador," one of the Bahama islands, the Norwegians had fallen in with Greenland, and had settled in it; nay, more, that they had even a feeble colony near Rhoda Island, on the Western continent itself. But no important results followed to mankind, or even to themselves, from these explorations. Alexander von Humboldt considers that the general adoption of the word America arose from its having been introduced into a popular work on geography published in 1507.]

A. As adjective: Pertaining to America. "And that chill Nova Scotia's unpromising strand Is the last I shall tread of American land." Moore. To the Boston Frigate.

¶ A number of American animals and plants, though identical in genus, are yet different in species from their analogues in the Old World. A yet greater number are named as if they were of the same genus, though not so in reality. All such terms, and others similar to them, if they find a place in the Dictionary, will be arranged under one or both of the substantives with which the adjective American agrees. Thus, in Zoology, American blight (Lachnus lanigerus), will be found under BLIGHT; and in Botany, American Aloe (Agave Americana), under ALOE and AOAWE; American Cranberry (Oxycoccus macrocarpus), under CRANBERRY and OXYCOCCUS; and American Marmalade (Achras mammosa), under MARMALADE and ACHRAS.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

2. Now: Any human inhabitant of America, aboriginal or non-aboriginal, white, red, or black. Specially, a native of the United States of North America. The name began while yet the future Republicans were British colonists.

"It has been said in the debate, that when the first American revenue act (the act in 1764 imposing the post duties) passed, the Americans did not object to the principle."—Burke on Concil. with America.

not curly; a swarthy-brown, copper, or cinnamon-coloured skin; a heavy brow; dull and sleepy eyes, with the corners directed upwards—in this respect resembling those of the Malay and Mongolian races; prominent cheek-bones; a salient but dilated nose; full and compressed lips, and an expression of gentleness combined with a gloomy and averse look. It includes all the American Indians, with the exception of the Esquimaux (Eskimo), who appear to be Turanians from the north of Asia.

A-mér'-i-can-izm, s. [Eng. American; -ism.] A word or phrase believed to be of American origin, or, at least, to be now used nowhere except in America. A-mér'-i-can-ist, s. [Eng. American; -ist.] "... one who investigates what is distinctive of America, so far as that it belongs, or is supposed to belong, to the domain of scientific research." (Times, Jan. 9, 1877.)

From Gr. ἀμέθυστος (amethystos); as adj. = not drunken; as s. = a remedy for drunkenness; á, priv., μέθυσ (methud) = to be drunk; μέθυσ (methus) = wine. So named either (1) from the foolish notion that it was a remedy for drunkenness; or (2), as Pliny thinks, because it did not reach, though it approximated to, the colour of wine.]

A. As substantive:

1. A mineral, a variety of Quartz, named by Dana Amethystine Quartz. Its colour, which is either diffused through the entire crystals or affects only their summits, is clear purple or bluish violet; hence it is sometimes called violet-quartz. The colouring matter is generally believed to be manganese, but Heintz considers it to arise from a mixture of iron and soda. The beauty and hardness of the amethyst cause it to be regarded as a precious stone. It occurs in veins or geodes in trappean and other rocks. The best specimens are brought from India, Armenia, and Arabia, but others of an inferior sort occur in various parts of Britain.

2. The Oriental amethyst: A rare purple variety of Sapphire (q.v.). [See also CORUNDUM.]

¶ The word amethyst in the English Bible [Sept. and N. T. Gr. ἀμέθυστος (amethystos) (Exod. xxviii. 19; Rev. xxi. 20)] is the rendering of the Heb. word יָסָפִיר (achhelamah). It is from the root שָׁלַם (chhalam) = to sleep; apparently from the delusion that the fortunate possessor of an amethyst is likely to sleep soundly. The last stone in the third row of the Jewish high-priest's breastplate was an "amethyst" (Exod. xxviii. 19); and the twelfth foundation of the new Jerusalem, mentioned in Rev. xxi. 20, was to be an "amethyst."

3. A colour, that of the mineral described above. (See B.)

B. As adjective:

ám-éth-ýst-é-a, s. [Ger. amethyste pflanze; Dut. amethystkruid; Fr. amethystée.] A genus of plants belonging to the order Lamiaceæ (Labiates). A. cœrulea is a pretty garden annual, with blue flowers.

The only known species is the A. nobilis, one of the most splendid trees existing. The flowers are large, scentless, and of a bright vermilion colour, diversified with three yellow spots, and disposed in gigantic ovate pendulous branches. The leaves are equally pinnate, large, and, when young, of a pale purple colour. It grows near Martaban, in the Eastern peninsula. The Burmese call it thoca, and offer handfuls of the flowers before the images of Boodhia.

[Lat. amia; Gr. ἀμία (amia) = a fish, the Scomber sarda of Bloch, which is allied to the tunny.] A genus of fishes formerly placed in the Esocidæ, or Pike family, but now constituting the type of the Ganoid family Amiidæ (q.v.). The species inhabit rivers in the warmer parts of America. The amia of the ancients, it will be perceived, is quite different from any of these fishes.

ām-yānth-y-ūm, s. [Same etym. as AMIANTHUS (?).] A genus of plants belonging to the order Melanthaceæ (Melantus). The A. muscatoxicum, as its name imports, is used to poison flies. The Americans of the United States call this plant Fall Poison, and say that cattle are poisoned if they feed in the fall (or autumn) upon its foliage. (Lindley: Vegetable Kingdom, p. 199.) The illustration shows the complete plant and one of the single flowerets.

From Gr. ἀμιαντος (amiantos) = undefiled, pure; from ἀμ, priv., and μαινω (mainō) = (1) to stain or dye; (2) to defile, to sully. So called because, it being incombustible, the ancients were wont from time to time to throw into the fire napery and towels made of it to cleanse them from impurity. They also sometimes enclosed the bodies of their deceased friends in cloth of the same material, that when cremation took place the ashes might remain free from intermixture with those of other people.]

1. Min.: A mineral, a variety of Asbestos, which again is classed by Dana as a variety of Amphibole. Tremolite, Actinolite, and other varieties of Amphibole, unless they contain much alumina, have a tendency to pass into varieties with long flexible fibres of flaxen aspect, to which the name of amianthus is applied.

2. A name for the fibrous kinds of chrysolite, which Dana classifies as a variety of Serpentine. As in the former case, there are long flexible fibres, looking like those of flax. The colour is greenish-white, green, olive-green, yellow, and brownish. It constitutes seams in serpentine rocks, occurring at home in Cornwall; Portsey; Unst, and Fetlar, in Shetland; abroad in Savoy, Corsica, the Pyrenees, and other localities. Most of the so-called amianthus is of this second variety.

Treating on the difference between amicable and friendly, Crabbe says that amicable implies a negative sentiment, a freedom from discordance; friendly, a positive feeling of regard, the absence of indifference. We make an amicable accommodation, and a friendly visit. Amicable is always said of persons who have been in connection with each other; friendly may be applied to those who are perfect strangers. Neighbours must always endeavour to live amicably with each other. Travellers should always endeavour to keep up a friendly intercourse with the inhabitants wherever they come. "To live amicably or in amity with all men, is a point of Christian duty; but we cannot live in friendship with all men, since friendship must be confined to a few."

The tail is homocercal, but with a certain approach to the heterocercal type. The family consists of small fishes, inhabiting rivers in the warmer parts of America.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, fāther; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, er, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, ūnīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

they are called monamines; when two H atoms are replaced, diamines; when three atoms of H, triamines. They are obtained by heating the iodides of the alcohol radicals with ammonia. Thus iodide of ethyl and ammonia yields ethylamine, N(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>)<sub>2</sub>; by heating the mono and the diamine with more iodide of ethyl, diethylamine, N(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>)<sub>3</sub>, H, and triethylamine, N(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>)<sub>3</sub>, are obtained. Triethylamine unites directly with iodide of ethyl, forming N(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>)<sub>3</sub>.C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>I, triethylamine ethyl iodide. This compound, heated with silver oxide and water, forms N(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>)<sub>3</sub>.C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>OH, a strong base, which is acid, like caustic potash. The H atoms can be replaced by different alcohol radicals, as methyl-ethyl-amyamine, N(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>)<sub>2</sub>(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>)<sub>2</sub>(C<sub>3</sub>H<sub>7</sub>). The H can be also replaced by metals, as monopotassamine, NH<sub>2</sub>K, and tripotassamine, NK<sub>3</sub>. The amines have a strong alkaline reaction like ammonia, and unite with acids to form salts.

am-mō-ní-a, s. [In Ger. ammoniak; Fr. ammoniac; Port. ammonia; Ital. ammoniaco = hydrochlorate of ammonia. From sal ammoniac, the salt from which it is generally manufactured. Chem.: A substance consisting of NH<sub>3</sub>. Molecular weight, 17. Sp. gr. 8.5, compared with H; compared with air (1), its sp. gr. is 0.59. It is a colourless, pungent gas, with a strong alkaline reaction. It can be liquefied at the pressure of seven atmospheres at 15°. Water at 0° dissolves 1,150 times its volume of NH<sub>3</sub>, at ordinary temperatures about 700 times its volume. A fluid dram of ammonia liquor fortior contains 15.85 grains of NH<sub>3</sub>, and has a sp. gr. of 0.891. The liquor ammonia of the Pharmacopoeia has a sp. gr. of 0.959, and a fluid dram contains 5.2 grains of NH<sub>3</sub>. (Water being unity, the specific gravity of ammonia is .0007594.) Ammonia is obtained by the dry distillation of animal or vegetable matter containing nitrogen; horns, hoofs, &c., produce large quantities, hence its name of spirits of hartshorn. Guano consists chiefly of urate of ammonia. But ammonia is now obtained from the liquor of gas-works; coal containing about two per cent. of nitrogen. Ammonia is formed by the action of nascent hydrogen on dilute nitric acid. Ammonia gas is prepared in the laboratory by heating together one part of NH<sub>4</sub>Cl with two parts by weight of quicklime, and is collected over mercury. NH<sub>3</sub> is decomposed into N and H<sub>2</sub> by passing it through a red-hot tube, or by sending electric sparks through it; the resulting gaseous occupy twice the volume of the ammonia gas. It is used in medicine as an antacid and stimulant; it also increases the secretions. Externally it is employed as a rubefacient and vesicant. Ammonia liniment consists of one part of solution of ammonia to three parts of olive oil. Ammonia is used as an antidote in cases of poisoning by prussic acid, tobacco, and other sedative drugs. Substitution ammonias are formed by the replacement of H by an alcohol radical forming Amines (q.v.) and by acid radicals forming Amides (q.v.). There are also ammonia substitution compounds of cobalt, copper, mercury, and platinum. (See Wallis's Dict. Chem.)

am-mō-nī-ā-cūm, s. [In Fr. ammoniacum; Ital. ammoniaco.] A gum resin, called also gum-ammoniac, which is imported into this country from Turkey and the East Indies in little lumps, or tears, of a strong and not very pleasing smell and a nauseous taste, followed by bitterness in the mouth. It is a stimulant, a deobstruent, an expectorant, an antispasmodic, a discutient and a resolvent. Hence it is internally employed in asthmas and chronic catarrh, visceral obstructions, and obstinate colic, whilst it is used externally in scirrhous tumours and white swellings of the joints. The plant from which it comes has not yet been thoroughly settled. That of Persia has been said to come from the Dorema Ammoniacum, but is more probably derived from the Ferula orientalis. (Lindley: Veg. Kingd.) Garrod believes it to be from the first-named of these two plants, which grows in Persia and the Punjab. Both are Umbelliferae.

Am-mō-nī-ān (1), † Am-ō-nī-ān, adj. [From Greek Ἀμμών (Ammon) and Ἄμμων (Amōn). Plutarch says that Amōn was the earlier and more correct form. Heb. אֲמוֹן (Amōn), Jer. xvi. 25. On the Egyptian monuments Amn.] Pertaining to Jupiter Ammon, or to his celebrated temple in the oasis of Siwah in Libya. [AMMONITE.]

Am-mō-nī-ān (2), a. [From the philosopher mentioned in the def.] Relating to Ammonius Saccas, who set up a school at Alexandria in the latter part of the second century, and founded the Neo-Platonic philosophy. He maintained that all religions taught essentially the same truths, and required only to be rightly interpreted completely to harmonise. To produce the wished-for agreement he allegorised away whatever was distinctive in the several systems. Origen adopted his views.

am-mō-nī-ō. In compos. = ammonium; as ammonio-magnesian, ammonio-palladious = ammonium in combination with magnesium, ammonia in combination with palladium.

Am-mōn-ite, s. [Eng. Ammon; -ite. In Ger. Ammonit; Greek Ἀμμών (Ammon), either an Egyptian word, or from the Gr. ἄμμος (ammos) = sand, and suffix -ite. "Ammonstone." Jupiter Ammon had a celebrated temple in an oasis of the Libyan desert, and was worshipped there under the form of a ram, the horns of which the fossil Ammonites were thought to resemble. Hence the genus was called by the older naturalists Cornu Ammonis, a designation altered by Bruguière into Ammonite.] A large genus of fossil chambered shells, belonging to the class Cephalopoda, the order Tetrabranchiata, and the family Ammonitidae. The shell is discoidal, the inner whorls more or less concealed, the septa undulated, the sutures lobed and foliated, and the siphuncle dorsal. Before geology became a science, even scientific men, and much more the unscientific, were greatly perplexed by these fossils. They were looked on as real ram's horns, or as the curled tails of some animals, or as petrified snakes, or as convoluted marine worms or insects, or as vertebrae. The petrified snake hypothesis being a popular one, some dealers fraudulently appended heads to make the resemblance more complete. It is to ammonites that Sir W. Scott refers when he says that—

"Of thousand snakes, each one
 Was changed into a coil of stone
 When holy Hilda prayed."
 Marmion, ll. 12

The ancients venerated them, as the Hindus still do. About 700 so-called species have been described, ranging from the Trias to the Chalk. Several attempts have been made to AMMONITE.

Chem.: The name given by Berzelius to a supposed monatomic radical (NH<sub>4</sub>). It is doubtful whether the ammonia salts—as chloride of ammonium, NH<sub>4</sub>Cl—contain this radical, that is, whether N is sometimes a pentatonic element, or the molecule of NH<sub>3</sub> is united with the acid, as HCl, by molecular attraction—thus, NH<sub>3</sub>.HCl—in the same manner as water of crystallisation is united in certain crystalline salts. At high temperature this salt is decomposed into NH<sub>3</sub> and HCl. The so-called amalgam of mercury and ammonium decomposes rapidly into hydrogen ammonia and mercury. It is formed by placing sodium amalgam in a saturated solution of NH<sub>3</sub>.HCl. It forms a light, bulky, metallic mass. A dark-blue liquid, acid to be (NH<sub>3</sub>)<sub>2</sub> (ammonium), has been formed at low temperature and high pressure. But many of the salts of ammonium are isomorphous with those of potassium and sodium. The salts of ammonium give off NH<sub>3</sub> when heated with caustic lime or caustic alkali. With platonic chloride they give a yellow precipitate of double platonic ammonium chloride; also with tartaric acid a nearly insoluble white crystalline precipitate of acid tartrate of ammonia. The salts of ammonium leave no residue when heated to redness.
